Oral Answers to Questions

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Press Complaints Commission

1. Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush): What meetings he has had with the Press Complaints Commission to discuss the effectiveness of the PCC code. [46311]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Chris Smith): I have had a number of meetings with Lord Wakeham, the chairman of the Press Complaints Commission. I welcomed the strengthening of the code of practice that was agreed on 19 December 1997, and I have made it clear that further changes should be considered to protect people in all walks of life.

Mr. Soley: I welcome that answer, but I ask the Secretary of State to bear in mind the needs of children. For example, on 7 May the Daily Mail named and photographed a four-year-old child on its front page just because her mother had been sent to prison in unusual circumstances. Would the PCC not be more convincing if it intervened after publication to point out to editors that such cases fall well below the standards expected both in normal life and under the PCC code?

Mr. Smith: I know that my hon. Friend has corresponded with the newspaper concerned in that case. The PCC code agreed last December extends protection to children of school age, unless there is an overriding public interest in publishing details about them. Both the procedures followed by the PCC and complainants, and the nature of the public interest test require further consideration in the coming months.

Tourism

2. Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): What plans he has to encourage the growth of employment in the tourism industry. [46312]

The Minister for Film and Tourism (Mr. Tom Clarke): The new tourism strategy which we are developing with the tourism forum will seek to ensure that tourism fulfils its enormous job-generation potential, while the new deal will help to solve the industry's skill shortages and recruitment problems. The tourism and hospitality industry already supports 1.7 million jobs, and it is forecast to need many more people in future.

Mr. Fraser: I am interested in the Minister's professed interest in the tourism industry. Why has his Department consistently subordinated tourism to more glamorous and trivial matters?

Mr. Clarke: The plain and simple fact is that we have not. When I gave evidence to the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport, it was unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman appeared only for the last two minutes of it. I am not, therefore, surprised by his total ignorance of the Government's absolute commitment to a vital industry.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Has the tourism strategy examined the valuable, but neglected, British resource of historic buildings associated with the birth and development of the Labour movement? The Minister will be aware that the sole surviving Clarion house, which dates from the days of the old Independent Labour party, is in my constituency. It would encourage the people of Pendle if I could tell them that the Minister will take on board the development of a resource of which we have much in the north of England.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend makes an extremely relevant point. That part of our country's heritage is important in attracting tourists. I am delighted that my hon. Friend mentioned his constituency, which I look forward to visiting. I know that, when he returns to Scotland, he will pay a visit to Robert Owen at Lanark and to the Summerlee heritage park in my constituency, which meets my hon. Friend's excellent point.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): What representations has the Minister received about the effect of the strength of the pound on the tourism industry? May I draw his attention to the profound gloom in the industry in Wales, which is combining with the collapse of livestock prices to lead to a crisis in the rural economy of Wales? Does the Minister accept that the combination of Government policies that are leading to the strength of the pound is having a serious effect on large parts of the country, and that the Government may have to pay a severe political price in the 1999 elections?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting point which was last discussed with me in Cardiff last Wednesday. The problems are transient, but I am happy to report that new figures show that expenditure by overseas tourists has declined by less than 1 per cent. on last year, which was a record year. Given the self-evident problems of the Asian market, the House will welcome the fact that expenditure from, for example, north America is up by 6 per cent. The Government are determined to build on those figures.

Design Promotion

3. Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): What role his Department is playing in promoting good design in (a) the media and (b) elsewhere. [46313]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Chris Smith): I visited the Royal College of Art's design, communications and humanities students' exhibition last week and was very impressed by the skill and flair of the works exhibited there. My Department works closely with the Department of Trade and Industry and the Design Council in promoting our designers and the importance overall of good design.

Mr. Sheerman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, often, the media, energetically aided and abetted by the Opposition, sneer at anything that design contributes to this country? Is it not a fact that Government Members cannot be complacent, because we have to champion design in every industry and Government Department? If we are to be truly internationally competitive, good design is paramount.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend is right about the importance of design and the quality of the Opposition. It is no accident that, for example, there are 150 different car types on the road whose designs have had input from Royal College of Art students. That is a very good record for British designers and British design, and a strength on which we should build.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey): Does the Secretary of State recognise that good design is about not only presentation but content? Is not his problem that he is so obsessed with pinning designer labels on everything that moves that the real issues are ignored? While he publishes airy rhetoric about design and goodness knows what, the tourism industry faces uncertainty, the arts are in crisis, the Royal Opera house is a shambles, the heritage has been designed out of the English language, and sport, music and design are being downgraded in our schools. Through all this, the Secretary of State dithers and does nothing, except cave in to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which I agree he is good at. The right hon. Gentleman is known to be decent, so why does he not do the decent thing and go before he is pushed? He would bring immense relief to his friends, and might even find time to write a proper book.

Mr. Smith: I had hoped that the hon. Gentleman's first question as Opposition spokesman would have been more accurate and have better content. He knows that his analysis of the arts, opera, design and the creative industries would have held true 13 months ago but does not now.

Tourism

4. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): What support he is giving to encourage tourism as a means of economic regeneration for seaside towns. [46314]

The Minister for Film and Tourism (Mr. Tom Clarke): The future of our seaside resorts has been a key consideration for the domestic tourism working group, whose final report, containing specific proposals, we received recently. These will be reflected in the tourism strategy to be published later this year.

Mr. Blizzard: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply and for his support for tourism in my constituency through his recent visit to Lowestoft to present the national blue flag beach awards and open our new marina, which was built with European funding. On the Agenda 2000 proposals for reform of the structural funds, will he press the President of the Board of Trade to support the inclusion of problems faced by seaside towns as a new criterion for objective 2? Will he ask the arts lottery board to take into account the capacity of projects for economic regeneration in considering applications? Lowestoft is submitting a bid for a spectacular glass monument to mark its position as Britain's most easterly point, which would be of great economic benefit to the town.

Mr. Clarke: I very much enjoyed my visit to my hon. Friend's constituency. I now understand—if I needed to learn—how popular he deservedly is. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister for Arts listened to the second part of my hon. Friend's question.

Tourism has already greatly benefited from European regional development fund money for projects that support and develop tourism and cultural attractions.

The total value of objective 1, 2 and 5b programmes for the period 1994 to 1999 is expected to be more than 3 billion ecu, or £2 billion. As the Minister responsible for tourism, I can assure my hon. Friend and others that I shall press for that support to continue.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): Is the Minister aware that Southend is a superb centre of tourism which he would do well to visit as soon as he can? Is he aware that some areas of high unemployment are included in travel-to-work areas of low unemployment, with the result that no funding can be provided for their special problems? Will he have a look at the unfair effects thereby created for some superb seaside towns such as Southend-on-Sea?

Mr. Clarke: I have not yet had the privilege of going to Southend, but I do look forward to it. I am sure that it is almost as attractive as Cathcart.

Unlike at least one Conservative Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Gentleman makes serious points—in this case, about employment. Seaside resorts are an extremely important issue for us, discussed time and again at our tourism forum—which has not been mentioned once by Tory Front Benchers. I thank the hon. Gentleman for his fair point, and assure him that, as tourism provides 7 per cent. of all employment, I should like it to offer constituents such as the hon. Gentleman's still more employment, especially via the new deal.

Mr. Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby): Does my right hon. Friend agree that areas such as mine need economic development not just at the seaside but more widely in the rest of the region? The region, after all, feeds the local tourism economy. Does he propose to have words with the regional development agencies, once they are set up, to stimulate regional tourism and the local economy by allowing local people an input?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The tourism industry in Great Britain needs a closer working relationship between the regional tourist boards and, in due course, the RDAs. I know that my hon. Friend has contributed thoughtful ideas in that respect; I can assure him that the membership of the forum is much concerned with his excellent point.

Mr. Ronnie Fearn (Southport): How closely is the Minister working with the Heritage Lottery Fund on obtaining funding for piers, not just in my constituency but in many other places? I know that he will say that he has nothing to do with influencing such funding, but surely the Department can make recommendations.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman, for whom I and all hon. Members have a great regard, has both asked and answered his question. Of course we cannot intervene in lottery allocations; the problems affecting his pier, and of expenditure elsewhere in England, were made considerably worse by the reckless and inadequate policies of the Conservative party. Over the past 10 years, the Tories reduced public expenditure on the English tourist board from £25.8 million to a mere £9.9 million a year. They should hang their heads in shame.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South): Does the Minister accept that many Labour Members are extremely supportive of and grateful for the Government's work on the new deal and appreciate their responsiveness to the particular problems of seaside towns and seasonal employment? What further representations has he received from the tourism industry in support and in respect of the new deal?

Mr. Clarke: I am happy to say that support for the new deal has been absolutely massive—[Interruption.]—as those who really work in their constituencies and in the industry understand. Would Conservative Members challenge Tim Bartlett, chief executive of the English tourist board, who said:

> "We . . . believe that our industry can make a major contribution to the New Deal, and that the tourist boards can offer a practical access route to over 15,000 members—mostly small or medium sized businesses—throughout the country"?

That is very positive. It appeals to us, but of course it would not register with Conservative Members.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey): We have been told that a planned series of ministerial visits to seaside resorts this summer has been cancelled on the advice of officials. It was to have been called the seaside rock tour, or some such nonsense. Is it surprising that Ministers are afraid to show their faces at seaside resorts, given that all they have delivered so far to the United Kingdom tourism industry is a tide of European Union regulation and threatened abolition of the English tourist board? Was the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport not right to say that tourism is insufficiently glamorous for the current Secretary of State? Is it not true that, far from getting a kiss-me-quick on the promenade, any Minister who is rash enough to visit a seaside resort this summer is likely to be told where he can stick his rock?

Mr. Clarke: I know that Jonathan Aitken is not around these days, but one would think that the shadow Minister might have got a better scriptwriter. The fact is that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I fully intend to visit many parts of the country; indeed, as the hon. Gentleman must know, we have already started. As for the speculation in which he indulges, it is that and no more. He encourages us to visit seaside resorts and we shall visit, with absolute delight, Labour Scarborough, Labour Blackpool, Labour Hove and many other resorts which will continue to return Labour Members of Parliament.

Sport (Social Exclusion)

5. Mr. David Lock (Wyre Forest): How his Department is working with the social exclusion unit to ensure sport plays a role in combating social exclusion. [46315]

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Tony Banks): My Department is working closely with the social exclusion unit. The last meeting took place as recently as 16 June. We see great potential for sport to play a part and we have already announced that we are working on a comprehensive strategy on sport which will, among other areas, address the problems of social exclusion. Sport is a great motivator, as we can see at the moment; it has a role to play in youth social inclusion.

Mr. Lock: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Football Association has taken great strides over the years to foster social inclusion through having schools of excellence for young footballers in clubs throughout the country? However, will he join me in expressing dismay at the FA's recent decision to limit schools of excellence to premiership and league clubs, thus leaving conference clubs such as Kidderminster Harriers in my constituency out in the cold? The 165 boys at that club will have no school from next year. Will my hon. Friend join me in urging the FA to think again and use his office to encourage it to take a broad approach towards tackling social exclusion in football through schools of excellence?

Mr. Banks: Obviously, football has a great role to play in programmes for social inclusion and I share my hon. Friend's disappointment that the Kidderminster Harriers club was not granted a licence to operate as an FA centre of excellence. However, that is a matter for the FA, and the technical control board that is responsible decided, for a variety of reasons, that it would not recognise Kidderminster Harriers' scheme.

I know that my hon. Friend has been campaigning, and I am more than ready to use my good offices to bring together my hon. Friend, the Football Association and Kidderminster Harriers so that we can explore that matter. We want football to flourish in Kidderminster and elsewhere. It was a great disappointment that, three years ago, Kidderminster was unable to join the football league because of its inability to meet the ground requirements. I shall certainly use my good offices to assist my hon. Friend and his club, and he is doing a great job in assisting it in the House today.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): Is the Minister not embarrassed by the fact that, last week, the Secretary of State introduced a new form of potential social exclusion—the social exclusion of those who are keen on test cricket, who may well be unable in future to watch it on terrestrial television? As someone who, as a Back Bencher, was a scourge of the tabloidisation of British politics, does the Minister not recognise that two days of adverse headlines have resulted in a wanton act of appeasement of the main proprietor of the tabloid?

Mr. Banks: I could never be disappointed in the actions of my right hon. Friend. The hon. Gentleman has a strange approach to this issue. Sky Television criticised my right hon. Friend's decision, while the British Broadcasting Corporation broadly welcomed it. Most importantly, the England and Wales Cricket Board welcomed the decision. Hon. Members must understand that the problem is how we get more resources into cricket while maintaining the maximum access through television. The money that the ECB will receive through Sky if the deals go ahead will enable cricket to be developed at school, county and local levels, which is why the Secretary of State made the right decision. It was a brave decision, but I am sure that it will lead to the development of greater cricketing ability in this country, which, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman agrees, we desperately need.

2006 World Cup

6. Ms Claire Ward (Watford): What discussions he has had on the 2006 world cup bid; and if he will make a statement. [46316]

Mr. Banks: I hold regular meetings with the Football Association. I have discussed the 2006 bid with key members of the FIFA executive committee, here in London and in their home countries, and the Government will continue to play a full part in the 2006 campaign.

Ms Ward: Does my hon. Friend agree that the criminal activities of drunken hooligans must not be allowed to knock off course England's world cup bid? Does he deplore the decision by the authorities in St. Etienne to allow all-day drinking, particularly in the light of the statement by the spokeswoman for the prefecture in Lens that the ban on alcohol was the main reason for the relative lack of trouble in that town?

Mr. Banks: I condemn unreservedly the behaviour of the small criminal element that caused trouble in Marseilles. When those who were imprisoned arrive back in this country, they will be dealt with using further restriction orders. Those who think that they may have got away with crimes in Marseilles should know that footage is still being examined. The French authorities will take action against them, and we support them entirely in that.

I cannot join in my hon. Friend's criticism and condemnation of decisions about drinking that might be taken in St. Etienne. It is amazing that a police officer in France, who said that the French want to keep their bars open so that they can keep the world cup festivities going, was condemned here by our tabloids as a lunatic who has escaped from an asylum, as if it is French people's fault that some of our fans cannot hold their drink. Drinking a lot is no excuse for trashing a town or beating up people. The French must be concerned about their town and their welfare, and I am happy to let them make their own decisions. I understand that there will be a press conference later this afternoon and the French authorities may change their decision. We should undoubtedly welcome that, but what a sad comment that is on the minority of English fans who still cannot mix football with drink.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): But will the Minister be any more effective in getting the world cup to come to the United Kingdom in 2006 than he has been in trying to get more than the derisory 2,000 seats for the next football match in France?

Mr. Banks: That is very good, but I am not Tone the Tout; I do not actually have tickets at my disposal. As hon. Members will know, I took a decision not to go on the ground that I somehow knew that this situation would develop. Obviously, the ticket allocation for England's match in St. Etienne is derisory, but the arrangement was made some time ago.

The blame lies with FIFA for allowing 60,000 tickets to go to French nationals, who clearly have not taken up their allocation but instead have sold them on the black market. A number of national associations did not need their tickets, but, instead of sending them back to FIFA so that they could be passed on to countries such as England, Germany, Holland, Japan and Argentina which needed them, they dumped them on the black market.

Hon. Members should not blame me. I would have loved to be responsible for ticket allocations. I might even have found one for the hon. Gentleman—or not, as the case may be. We must ensure that, after this is over,

FIFA carries out a thorough investigation so that this shambles is not repeated either in 2002 or in 2006, when England will host the world cup.

Heritage Lottery Fund (Access Fund)

7. Laura Moffatt (Crawley): What plans he has to ensure that the Heritage Lottery Fund's access fund benefits projects targeted at disadvantaged people. [46318]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Chris Smith): I am delighted to welcome the museums access fund, which will improve access to museums and galleries and will, of course, as part of its work, support access for those who are disadvantaged. I have recently issued new policy directions to the Heritage Lottery Fund, giving increased emphasis to the need to use lottery funding to promote access to the heritage for people from all sections of society and to take into account the scope for reducing economic and social deprivation.

Laura Moffatt: Does my right hon. Friend agree that access is not just about physically getting into a building? The many access groups throughout the country will be very willing to assist with this new direction, which I know they welcome very much. If we are truly interested in fairness for those on low incomes, the unemployed and those with young children, we must ensure that they can get into these wonderful buildings. If we are truly interested in equality, we must pay particular attention to that.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Getting as many people as possible to enjoy the riches in the great storehouses of this country is one of the major objectives of Government policy. It is why, for example, we were delighted to announce at the time of the Budget that we were maintaining free admission for everyone to great national collections such as the national gallery, the Tate and the British museum.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): In that case, will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the British library will not charge for admission?

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman may not have heard my speech at the opening dinner of the British library last week, when I welcomed the fact that access to the reading rooms for ordinary readers would be free.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): I thank my right hon. Friend for his support and encouragement for help for disadvantaged people from the lottery fund. Is he aware that many of our local communities would like to help disadvantaged people in any way they can? Will he give them some advice on obtaining lottery funding to help disadvantaged people? It is important that we consider what is happening within our communities and what assistance should be given to them.

Mr. Smith: In a few months, we will be launching a pilot scheme in the east midlands, where the lottery distributors will join together to provide a fast-track scheme for local community organisations that wish to put in bids for small grants to help their own neighbourhoods and communities. I hope that that scheme will roll out nationwide from April next year.

Broadcasting (Impartiality)

8. Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): If he will make a statement on the (a) provisions in the charter and agreement and (b) legislation which require the British Broadcasting Corporation and independent television and radio to treat politically controversial subjects with due impartiality. [46319]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Chris Smith): The Independent Television Commission and the Radio Authority have a statutory duty to do all that they can to ensure that broadcasters in the commercial sector report news accurately and treat matters of political and industrial controversy with due impartiality. The BBC governors have equivalent obligations under the BBC charter and agreement. The regulators set out detailed requirements guidelines in their programme codes.

Dr. Lewis: I thank the Secretary of State for reminding the House about the statutory and other duties laid on the BBC and ITV to treat politically controversial subjects impartially. Is he aware of the fact that, on one of the most politically controversial subjects of the day—British entry into economic and monetary union—in a recent poll, 65 per cent. of people declared themselves against it, 33 per cent. in favour and only 2 per cent. undecided? In the light of that, will he agree that, if the BBC or ITV, in the months ahead, persist with pursuing a Euro-federalist propaganda initiative in their broadcasts, they will be behaving not only undemocratically, but illegitimately?

Mr. Smith: I see no difficulty in the true impartiality with which those matters—as all political matters—are dealt with by BBC and ITV journalists, in a truly professional manner. I notice that it has not stopped the hon. Gentleman, who was once a member of the Labour party in Newham, from doing a perfectly competent job at making a fool of himself on the Tory Benches.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): One way in which the BBC can escape its responsibilities is simply not to broadcast Parliament or any of its hearings—in other words, to substitute programmes in which political journalists interview other political journalists. What effort is my right hon. Friend making to monitor the correct reporting of Parliament?

Mr. Smith: I am very concerned to ensure that the BBC and other broadcasters continue to report Parliament fairly and effectively. I know that my hon. Friend, Madam Speaker and other hon. Members have made strong representations on that matter, and they will continue to monitor how the BBC performs.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross): Bearing in mind the BBC's reluctance to listen to those who have made representations about its change of policies on the broadcasting of politically controversial issues, will the Secretary of State throw his weight behind proposals to establish an election commission, which would be independent and would be capable of bringing under its purview the whole issue of broadcasting and fairness, in respect not only of elections but of referendums, with which we are becoming more familiar?

Mr. Smith: I am not sure that an election commission is needed to establish the clear principle of impartiality in all such matters, be they parliamentary elections, other elections or referendums. The BBC and other broadcasters must remain impartial; that principle is clearly established, and I emphasise that it is the duty of the governors and of the ITC to ensure that that impartiality is upheld.

Football (Racism)

9. Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey): What steps the football task force is taking to combat racism in football. [46321]

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Tony Banks): The football task force has completed an excellent report into racism in football and made numerous practical recommendations to combat this blight on the game. I have written to all the organisations identified in the report as having a role to play, asking them how they intend to implement the recommendations relevant to them. I am very pleased with the positive responses that I have received from those organisations to date.

Mr. Wyatt: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. While we are waiting for a gap in the legislative process, could I persuade my hon. Friend to publish a league table of worst offenders in soccer, so that we can shame the clubs, and their shareholders?

Mr. Banks: On waiting for a gap in the legislative timetable, the House should be aware that the Government will amend the Football (Offences) Act 1991 to make racist abuse by individual spectators an offence, and that we want to do so as speedily as possible. My hon. Friend dangles before me an interesting and tempting proposition. I shall consider it in due course, and I may come back to him with a more considered response.

Millennium Commission Grants (North-west Region)

10. Helen Jones (Warrington, North): What proportion of the funding available to the Millennium Commission will be spent in the north-west region. [46322]

Mr. Banks: To date, the Millennium Commission has awarded grants totalling just over £93 million to 15 capital projects in the north-west region, from a national total of just under £1.24 billion. The north-west will also benefit from the £100 million millennium festival fund and the millennium awards scheme for individuals.

Helen Jones: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. However, is he not aware of the great disquiet in constituencies such as mine over uneven distribution of funds from the Millennium Commission? Will he undertake to do all in his power to persuade the commission to consider favourably applications from areas that have not yet received any millennium funding—which just happen to include my own constituency?

Mr. Banks: Yes, I accept that, for my hon. Friend, that is a bit of a bummer. We all like to see money coming into our constituency.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): The hon. Gentleman is a statesman.

Mr. Banks: I like to move around.

I tell my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) that a series of projects in the north-west will be of enormous benefit to the entire region. She will understand that, because of changes that we are making to lottery administration in the National Lottery Bill, a fairness test will be possible, to consider strategically how funds are spent across the country. One wants there to be greater evenness and fairness in distributing lottery funds, and I think that my hon. Friend can look with some hope to the future in respect of her constituency and large amounts coming from the lottery.

Creative Industries

11. Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): What assessment he has made of the job creation potential of Britain's creative industries. [46323]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. Chris Smith): The latest job survey figures produced on behalf of the Department for Education and Employment by the Office of National Statistics show that some 1.5 million people are employed in the creative industries. I intend shortly to publish the results of an exercise undertaken on behalf of the creative industries task force to map in greater detail the wealth and job-creation scope of the creative industries.

Mr. Linton: Is my right hon. Friend aware that that 1.5 million figure, coupled with the 1.7 million figure comprising those working in the tourism industries, mean that he is responsible for two of the largest industries and biggest earners of foreign exchange in the United Kingdom? Is he aware that those industries have constantly to be replenished with new talent? Will he therefore discuss with employers in the theatre, film and television industries how they can make the new deal available to young self-employed artists, especially through open learning, in the same way as the music industry has made the new deal available to young musicians?

Mr. Smith: The answer to my hon. Friend's specific question is yes. We are already in discussion with those parts of the world of the arts to ensure that they can take full advantage of the new deal. On the general point, not only are those sectors of enormous economic importance but they are currently growing at twice the rate of the overall economy. That is why we take those parts of our economy seriously—although, from their earlier comments, it is quite obvious that Opposition Members do not.

MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO (MILLENNIUM EXPERIENCE)

The Minister was asked—

Millennium Experience

29. Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): How much money from the private sector has been raised so far for the millennium experience at Greenwich. [46342]

The Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Peter Mandelson): Over £100 million of private sector sponsorship has been identified so far. The New Millennium Experience Company is in active discussion with a number of companies, and is on course to achieve the target of £150 million by the end of the year.

Mr. Taylor: Can it be true that the Minister is spending £500,000 trying to find out what makes us British? Will he accept it from me that one of our finest manifestations is the English language, which he is murdering by calling the British zone "UK at Now"?

Mr. Mandelson: I am not quite sure what that question has to do with private sector sponsorship of the millennium dome. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman—before moving on to a different matter, with which I shall deal in a moment—might have congratulated the company on its success in identifying that amount of money to date. One year ago, not one penny of private sector sponsorship had been identified by the previous Administration. I have read, with interest, the same articles as the hon. Gentleman on the national identity zone. However, I have to say that, just last Friday, as I visited the design company and team working on the zone, I did not recognise much in the reports that was true. As for the specific issue of the opinion poll—which will not be costing £500,000—I should prefer to see in the dome what the British people themselves regard and express as their national identity. I am rather more interested in the views of the British people than I am in those of any team of designers, the millennium organisers or the Minister without Portfolio.

Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): Has my hon. Friend seen the report by the English tourist board, which suggests that the millennium experience and the dome will be a huge boost for jobs in the south-east, which will have a direct impact on my constituency and the outlying areas of Sussex and Kent?

Mr. Mandelson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The report by the English tourist board is extremely encouraging and confirms one reason—employment creation and its benefit to the British economy—of the many for going ahead with the millennium project in the first place. In addition, the British Tourist Authority has said that, on a conservative estimate, the experience will generate £300 million to £500 million of overseas revenue, and the true amount could be double that—£1 billion could be the economic halo effect for Britain of our holding this millennium experience.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey): I am not entirely sure that the hon. Gentleman has finally crossed his t's and dotted his i's in terms of the sponsorship that he claims but, be that as it may, I want to be helpful about the dome—[Hon. Members: "No!"] Oh yes, I want to be helpful. Is not the single biggest impediment the fact that, in the hands of the Minister without Portfolio, the project is increasingly being seen as a party political bandwagon, albeit one that has already lost a couple of wheels? Would not the most helpful thing be for the Minister now to give way to a non-political person of real independence and stature who can get to grips with the project and pull in the remaining sponsorship that is so badly needed?

Mr. Mandelson: The hon. Gentleman says that he wants to be a little more supportive. He may not have noticed that the question that he has just asked is exactly the question asked by his predecessor, not only at the previous session of oral questions, but at the one before, so the hon. Gentleman seems to be stuck in a bit of a rut. I am surprised because the hon. Gentleman was a member of the Government and of the National Heritage Department team that originally developed the proposals for the millennium experience in the first place. I hope that, on that basis, we can look forward to a little more encouragement and support for the excellent work being undertaken.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Will my hon. Friend point out to the House that the private sector companies investing in the millennium dome are this country's world-class companies? It is a tribute to them that they see it as an opportunity to sell their wares and the talents and skills of this country. It is difficult these days to ask a question in support of the millennium dome because of the awful attitude of the Opposition; some London Labour Members who do not know what is a good investment in their own backyard; and The Daily Telegraph, which calls us sycophants if we show any support, but does my hon. Friend accept that he has our support and will continue to have it because the project is good for Britain and good for our future?

Mr. Mandelson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that support. The fact is that no comparable event has raised such a large sum of money so quickly in private sector sponsorship, or so far in advance of the event taking place. That is absolutely unprecedented and very encouraging. As my hon. Friend points out, our best and most forward-looking companies are picking up the challenge because they see their commercial interest coinciding with the national interest. We are on course to meet our ambitious sponsorship target. It is very ambitious indeed, but I am confident that we shall meet it by the end of the year. I look forward to announcements of further substantial sponsors quite soon.

Spirit Zone

31. Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): If he will make a statement on the progress of preparations for the spirit zone. [46346]

The Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Peter Mandelson): Details of the design for the spirit zone of the millennium experience were made public on 24 February this year. Since then, the New Millennium Experience Company has been working closely with the Lambeth Consultation Group, which comprises representatives of the main Churches and other faith groups, to ensure that the zone reflects the spiritual values identified by the Lambeth group. Copies of the group's document setting out its approach have been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Loughton: Will the Minister suggest how a Christian visitor to the dome—celebrating, after all, the birthday of Christ—may enjoy spiritual contemplation in the spirit zone with the roar of the Blackwall tunnel below, the clamour of the Cirque du Soleil just yards away six times a day, and not a crucifix in sight?

Mr. Mandelson: The Lambeth group, on which the Churches are represented, has agreed the design brief and the approach that is being taken by the company to the construction of the zone and to the millennium experience. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman, from his close examination of the proposals, is disappointed, but, when he comes to the dome, as I hope that he and his family will, he will be as excited as other Christians and members of other religious faiths. If, however, he does not want to come to the dome, he might bear it in mind that the Churches are organising a full programme of events in that year, focused on Pentecost 2000 on 10 and 11 June, and the millennium affirmation, which it is also sponsoring. There will also be national church services to mark the passing of the millennium. If that is not enough, the New Millennium Experience Company has already said that there will be a place in the dome for private prayer.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): Has the British Humanist Association been involved in the discussions in relation to the spirit zone, to ensure that the growing number of people who have no belief in any religion, but who do believe there is a spiritual nature to mankind, are involved in the spirit level?

Mr. Mandelson: My hon. Friend touches on an important point, which is that, although the dome should reflect the important contribution that the Christian Church has made to our history and society, we also want the millennium experience to be open to members of all faiths and of none. I am sorry that some Conservative Members do not share that view. They think that it should be an exclusive event—only for those who go to church. It will be enjoyable and appealing to those who go to church, but it will also be appealing to those of all faiths and of none, and that is precisely what it should be.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Overseas Investments

35. Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth): What is the value of the commissioners' assets invested abroad. [46351]

Mr. Stuart Bell (Second Church Estates Commissioner, representing the Church Commissioners): The commissioners have £350 million invested in overseas equities, representing approximately 10 per cent. of their total assets.

Mr. Jenkins: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. As he must be aware, newspaper reports in recent months have shown quite heavy losses in the far east. What is the extent of those losses to the Church's holdings? Will he take a message from me to the Church Commissioners? Will he remind them of the old adage, "In God we trust. Others pay cash"?

Mr. Bell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his supplementary question. In 1997, a total return of 10.6 per cent. was achieved on overseas equities, which compared favourably with the UK pension fund universal return of 7.5 per cent. That result has contributed to the commissioners' overall performance, which placed it in the top 1 per cent. when compared with other UK pension funds.

In relation to the far east, we are all aware that we live in a global economy, and one with a thatched roof. If there is a fire in the far east Asia part of the roof, it has some impact. However, I am happy to say that the impact on the Church Commissioners' money has been very limited. Our assets have moved from £2.1 billion in 1992 to £3.5 billion in 1997.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): After a bad experience quite a long time ago, have not the Church Commissioners done a remarkable job in the past few years? Should we not all be pleased about the turnaround in their fortunes, which is a great tribute to the integrity and effort of the people who look after the money for them? Will the hon. Gentleman—just to reassure the hon. Member for Tamworth (Mr. Jenkins), who clearly does not understand—confirm that a portfolio of that size, by its nature, has to be invested throughout the world? I am sure that the Church Commissioners have taken whatever steps they need to take to respond to the crisis in the far east.

Mr. Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments, which will be greatly welcomed by the Church Commissioners and their staff, who spend an enormous amount of time investing £3.5 billion. The valuation loss from our far eastern equities has been proportionately minor compared with those of other institutional funds because of our relatively low exposure to those areas.

Spirit Zone

36. Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): What steps the Commissioners are taking to finance the spirit zone in the millennium dome. [46352]

Mr. Stuart Bell (Second Church Estates Commissioner, representing the Church Commissioners): The commissioners will not be providing finance for the spirit zone. They are required by law to use their income for the stipends, pensions and housing of the clergy of the Church of England. However, I have made it clear to the New Millennium Experience Company that, as Second Church Estates Commissioner,

I am willing, with others, to assist the company in opening discussions with potential sponsors who see the importance of that essential element for the zone's success.

Mr. Pike: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Press reports have said that several million pounds are needed to finance the spirit zone in the millennium dome. Is he confident that the money will be raised through sponsorship and that the zone will be ready when the dome opens?

Mr. Bell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that supplementary. My hon. Friend the Minister without Portfolio, the New Millennium Experience Company and the Churches, through the Lambeth Consultation Group, have demonstrated their determination to have a spirit zone in the dome and to make it a success. For what it is worth, I add my determination and commitment to ensuring that the spirit zone and other Church events referred to by my hon. Friend the Minister without Portfolio will be a success.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that many of my constituents have expressed concern that, while previous generations have built soaring cathedrals, we are building the dome? Given that we are officially a Christian country, will the hon. Gentleman confirm that there will be a place in the millennium experience for the celebration of the anniversary that the millennium is all about?

Mr. Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that supplementary. The Church has gone to great lengths to ensure a full Christian dimension in the spirit zone. The Archbishop of Canterbury went to see the millennium dome and missed the England-Romania game—greater love hath no man. He is content with the Christian element of the spirit zone, as is the Lambeth group. When it is fully revealed to the public and to the hon. Gentleman's constituents, I am sure that they, too, will be content.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): Will the hon. Gentleman assure us that the Church Commissioners will use the opportunity of the millennium for a review of the assets of the Church of England? In some places, we have five churches where one would do. We have vicarages and houses that are inappropriate for our generation. Church plants are often made away from where the people are. One of the most useful things that we can do to get across the message of the Christian faith is to ensure that the money that we are spending is used wisely, economically and, above all, in the right place.

Mr. Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. As the House knows, we passed the draft National Institutions Measure two weeks ago, creating an Archbishops Council. No doubt, the council will wish to consider the hon. Gentleman's question to see whether the Church's finances can be better focused and streamlined. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there are many sources of finance in the Church. No doubt, the Archbishops Council will want to consider his suggestion.

Ethical Investments

37. Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): If he will make a statement on the Church Commissioners' 30 per cent. threshold for ethical investments. [46353]

Mr. Stuart Bell (Second Church Estates Commissioner, representing the Church Commissioners): Precise benchmarking criteria are not operated. The benchmark that we use is whether the restricted areas represent a sufficiently limited proportion of the whole group, rather than the absolute size.

Mr. Flynn: How do the Church's investments in weapons of warfare advance the work of the prince of peace?

Mr. Bell: I am always grateful for helpful supplementaries, of which that is one. The Church welcomes the new European Union code of conduct on arms sales, which should tighten the laws on arms sales to repressive regimes. We work closely with the ethical investment working group of the Church Commissioners, which has developed a dialogue over the past two years with companies that manufacture arms. We ensure that companies always operate under Government licence and within the ethical guidelines of the Church Commissioners.

Clergy Funding

38. Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): If he will make a statement on the work of the Church Commissioners during the past year in respect of funding clergy. [46354]

Mr. Stuart Bell (Second Church Estates Commissioner, representing the Church Commissioners): In 1997, the commissioners' total expenditure on behalf of the Church was £130.6 million—£82 million on clergy pensions. We contributed £24.6 million towards the total stipends bill of £159.7 million.

Sir Sydney Chapman: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that answer. In commending the commissioners and their advisers on the great and welcome increase in the returns recently secured on their investments, will the hon. Gentleman give an assurance that a large proportion of it will benefit clergy, stipends and pensions through the dioceses?

Mr. Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The commissioners' aim is always to achieve sustainable expenditure so that we can continue to meet our principal objective of supporting ministry in the neediest diocese. As part of that plan, as he will know, we aim to provide minimum support of £20 million for parochial ministry in the foreseeable future. On the dioceses, to which he referred, it is important that parishioners meet a growing proportion of needs of the Church through stipends costs and, of course, the cost of future service pensions. I am sure that he appreciates the floor of £20 million a year.

Opposition Day

[15TH ALLOTTED DAY]

The Economy

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.30 pm

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham): I beg to move,

That this House notes that the last Government left a golden economic legacy of low inflation, steady and sustainable growth and falling unemployment; that, since the General Election, there have been 17 tax rises and 6 increases in interest rates, leaving the typical family £1,000 a year worse off; that the economy is becoming dangerously unbalanced, with manufacturing in recession, the claimant count rising and the savings ratio falling to its lowest level since 1990 as a result of the Government's attack on pensions and savings; further notes that, at the same time, inflation has risen to its highest level for six years and believes that the Chancellor's decision to abandon control of public spending and to reverse his plans to repay national debt risks adding further inflationary pressure; concludes that the Government has created boom and bust at the same time; and deplores the Government's mishandling of the economy.

For the avoidance of doubt, I declare my business interests as set out in the register—all companies with an interest in the well-being of the British economy.

I have here a fax from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which my office received at four minutes past 2 o'clock this afternoon. It reads thus:

"As President of ECOFIN, I must appear before the European Parliament's Economic and Monetary Affairs Committee at the beginning and at the end of the UK Presidency to give a report on the Presidency, and to answer questions from members of the Committee.

The Committee has arranged to meet today at 3pm in Brussels"— four minutes before I received the fax, given the time difference. That was clearly a very urgent appointment. It says much about the Chancellor that it was more important to him to appear before the European Parliament—not even the whole European Parliament, but one of its committees—than to appear before the House of Commons to defend his handling of the British economy. We appreciate that the meeting might be only one of the few European meetings at which he is still welcome, but it is lamentable that he has failed to show up to defend what he has done.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: I should like to get started. If the hon. Gentleman will contain himself in patience awhile, I shall give way to him.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Just in case the House is being misled, the right hon. Gentleman should clarify whether the Chancellor is speaking to a committee of the European Parliament, as he suggested, or to the Finance Ministers of all member states. The right hon. Gentleman led us to believe that the meeting was of some minor European Parliament committee. I think that he is misleading the House.

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order; it is a matter of argument. I am sure that the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) will make the position absolutely clear.

Mr. Maude: I did make it absolutely clear.

Mr. Maude: If the hon. Gentleman listens, I shall tell him the answer. The meeting is of the European Parliament's Economic and Monetary Affairs Committee; it is not ECOFIN.

Mr. Sheerman: The right hon. Gentleman said that it was ECOFIN.

Mr. Maude: I said that it was the Economic and Monetary Affairs Committee of the European Parliament; I read the whole thing out verbatim. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Maude: It is a matter of regret that the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not feel that it is important to defend his handling of the British economy in the House of Commons.

Because of the central importance of the Treasury and of the Chancellor in the Government, on his decisions are placed the hopes and fears of millions of people. It is for that reason that the House must examine carefully what he has done, how it has affected the economy and how it matches the solemn pledges that he and the Prime Minister made, to secure their election.

I start with a prediction about the course of the debate. Madam Speaker, you should expect a succession of interventions—

Mr. Gardiner rose—

Mr. Maude: In fact, the first may be on his feet already.

The interventions will come from pre-programmed Labour Back Benchers, who will parrot out—[Interruption.] It is nice to hear that they are limbering up already.

No one should expect—

Mr. Gardiner: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment.

No one should expect Labour to talk much about today's economy and about its prospects over the next few years. I predict that today the Chief Secretary will pound out the Chancellor's familiar mantras, and will do everything that he can to avoid talking about the current economy.

It is strange that while Labour was basking in the glow of the golden economic legacy that it inherited, it cheerfully took the credit for all that occurred.

Mr. Gardiner: The right hon. Gentleman alluded to "pre-programmed Labour Back Benchers". I wish to reassure him that I am a pre-programmed Back Bencher. However, from a fax addressed to the right hon. Francis Maude from Andrew Tyrie MP, which came to my office not long ago—I presume by mistake—it is apparent that the right hon. Gentleman had raised questions with the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) on the very point of the economic legacy. For example, he asked:

"Are we saying that the public finances are strong or not?"

The answer was:

"Yes. Our legacy."

The right hon. Gentleman then asked:

"If yes, is this because we left them strong, or because Brown has been an Iron Chancellor?"

It continues in the same vein.

How does the right hon. Gentleman have the gall to come before the House and talk about the "golden economic legacy" and question the Government's programme, when he does not seem to know about those matters and has to question junior Conservative Back-Bench Members?

Mr. Maude: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman raised that. He has referred to a document that was produced before the Chancellor came to the House two weeks ago, to set out what the real state of public finances is. I shall deal with exactly the questions that the hon. Gentleman raises. He might not find it quite so enjoyable when I do.

It is worth reminding ourselves just what the legacy was—not in dry numbers, but in terms of what was said about it. Labour Members may not remember this, because they have short-term memories, but it is worth reminding ourselves of what the International Monetary Fund said in 1996. It stated that "recent economic performance"

"has been enviable. Since 1992, output growth has rebounded, unemployment declined markedly and inflation been brought down to the lowest levels in a generation. The strong overall performance is a product of sound economic policies—the unfettering of market forces initiated in the 1980s and the medium term and stability oriented cast imparted to fiscal and monetary policies".

That was then, but what about now? Now that the trickle of bad news threatens to turn into a torrent, do not expect to hear so much about it today. If the Chief Secretary talks about it, I predict that it will all turn out to be somebody else's fault.

Let us start by recalling what Labour promised. Let us look at the early pledges. Labour said that it would "set . . . rules for government spending and borrowing; ensure low inflation;"— that is a good one—

"strengthen the economy so that interest rates are as low as possible."

Mrs. Helen Brinton (Peterborough): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: Those are the only pledges that the hon. Lady supported.

What do they mean? What did the Labour manifesto say? In fact, it said:

"We will provide stable economic growth with low inflation, and promote dynamic . . . business and industry at home and abroad."

Then there was that unequivocal promise not to raise taxes. I shall quote directly from the Prime Minister.

Mrs. Brinton: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: The hon. Lady will probably want an opportunity to listen to the Prime Minister's words. He said:

"We've no plans to increase taxation at all."

We are all becoming familiar with the way in which the Prime Minister says the first thing that comes into his mind at the Dispatch Box, whether it is true or not, but what does the Chief Secretary think he meant by those words? Which of those words is in any way ambiguous? Is it "we"? Is it "have"? Is it "no"? Is it "plans"? Is it "increase"? Is it "taxation"? How can the Government claim that that was somehow a non-operative promise? [Interruption.] If any Labour Member wants to explain how that pledge is compatible with the fact that the Government have raised taxes 17 times, I shall give way.

Mrs. Brinton rose—

Mr. Maude: If the hon. Lady wants to intervene on that specific point, I shall give way.

Mrs. Brinton: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. He seems to have some difficulty in mastering his new brief. Will he explain why, under the Conservative Government, this country suffered the two worst recessions since the second world war and the slowest period of growth?

Mr. Maude: It is nice to know that the pre-programming works. I said to the hon. Lady that I would give way if she was going to talk about the Prime Minister's pledge, which has clearly been broken time and again, but Labour Members do not want to talk about today's economy or the pledges that they made and then broke.

The Government's performance has turned out to be rather different from what the pledges suggested. Inflation has risen, interest rates have risen, the pound has risen, taxes have risen and unemployment has begun to rise. At the same time, the balance of payments has fallen, manufacturing output has fallen, investment growth has fallen, productivity has fallen and savings have fallen. The Government claim that they have cut welfare spending, but every welfare reform that they have introduced has cost more, not less, and will bring more people into welfare. [Interruption.] I hear the sounds of dissent, but Labour Members should look at their plans—every reform will cost more and bring more people into welfare. What a dismal record of failure.

We know what the Chief Secretary will say; he will say, "It's all someone else's fault." The promise on inflation was not only a pledge, but in the Prime Minister's handwriting. It is a pity that the Government have missed that pledge 12 months out of 13. The Government inherited inflation at 2.5 per cent., and it is now at 3.2 per cent. That is an increase not of 10 or 20 per cent., but of no less than 28 per cent. We shall be told not to worry, however, as that is someone else's fault—it is the fault of the Bank of England, or of British businesses, which are, we are told, paying their staff too much.

Does the Chief Secretary have any idea how ridiculous he and the Chancellor make themselves when they—who do not have a day's business experience between them—strut around lecturing Britain's most successful companies on how much they should be paying their excellent staff? Do they not understand that, in the real world—not the cloistered world in which they move—people who face an increase in the cost of living because the Government have raised taxes on cars, houses, pensions, mortgages and marriage will ask for more pay? In the Government's never-never land, inflation is the fault of Marks and Spencer, which pays its staff too much.

The Chief Secretary may not have noticed that the Government are railroading through legislation to force many other companies to pay their employees more. We look forward with keen interest to hearing how he will reconcile lecturing Marks and Spencer on paying its people too much with ordering many more companies to pay their staff more.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central) rose—

Mr. Maude: If the hon. Gentleman wants to intervene on that point, I shall give way.

Mr. Davies: On the very point of inflation rates at the factory gate, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, in terms of RPI(Y)—the underlying inflation rate, which does not take account of taxation and interest rates—the rate is down on average? RPI(Y) was at 3 to 3.5 per cent. between 1995 and 1997, but is now going down.

Mr. Maude: We have actually got someone to talk about what is happening today. The problem is that the hon. Gentleman took the wrong measure. The Government have failed to meet the Chancellor's chosen measure and target, and that is what they have to explain.

So far, we have had six interest rate rises, and the Governor of the Bank of England is predicting another this month, but that is someone else's fault, too. Does not the Chief Secretary realise that, by raising taxes, the Government have increased the cost of living and created pressure on earnings? Does he not understand that, by attacking savings, they boost spending? As interest rates have been pushed higher than they need have been, the pound has reached levels that cause intense pain to manufacturers and exporters.

The Government have committed themselves, in dogmatic principle, to scrapping the pound at the earliest opportunity, but do they have to choose such a painful way of setting about it? Is it surprising that we now hear talk of an ancient phenomenon that I barely recollect from my distant youth in the days of the previous Labour Government—the spectre of stagflation? We all thought that that word had disappeared, but it is reappearing among economic commentators—the spectre of stagflation again stalks the land.

Ms Claire Ward (Watford): Is not the truth that the real reason for the interest rate increases was that the previous Government played politics with interest rates and refused to raise them in the last year before the general election to stem inflation, and so forced this Government to take the necessary action and give that power to the Bank of England? Is not the real reason the Tories' failure when they were in government?

Mr. Maude: It is always someone else's fault; it is never the fault of this Government. It has nothing to do with them; they are merely the Government and they merely take the decisions. How have they managed that with the balance of payments figures heading sharply into the red—just the faintest whiff of a balance of payments crisis? With our economy turning down and the European economies starting a gradual recovery, this should have been the time at which the balance of payments turned decisively in our favour, but it is doing the reverse.

What has happened to our export-led recovery? Last week, the Confederation of British Industry figures showed export orders for May and June at their lowest for 15 years. The Government have blown it already—after only a year, they are frittering the legacy away and it is all coming apart. Therefore, it is not surprising that manufacturing is already in recession, with falling production in the past two quarters and jobs lost day after day.

Maria Eagle (Liverpool, Garston) rose—

Mr. Maude: I have already given way several times, so I shall continue for a while. Day after day, jobs are lost, investments are cancelled and businesses are going bust.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Maude: So many hon. Members are cheerfully trying to take part that it is hard to choose among them. Today, the CBI survey shows that business failures are up nearly 10 per cent.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) rose—

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman should listen to these figures, as he might want to talk about the effect on his constituency. I am talking about business failures the length and breadth of the country. Small business failures are up nearly 25 per cent., and that is from new Labour, which claims to be the party of new business. However, for those small businesses, which have failed because of the Government's policies, the party is over now.

Will the Chief Secretary tell us today whether he still stands by the growth forecast set out in the Red Book? Does he still believe the figures that he and the Chancellor put in it? Will he guarantee that Britain will not go into recession during this Parliament? More and more commentators are asking not whether we shall have a hard landing but when. Let us hear now what the Chief Secretary has to say about that.

What did the Government say about savings? Oh yes, they said that one of their tax principles would be to promote savings and investment. They have made a difference, and for the many, not the few, they have made the situation much worse. In the Red Book, the Chancellor predicted that the savings ratio would fall to 9 per cent. during this Parliament. He must be feeling pleased with himself as he has nearly got there already. The figures show that the ratio was already down from 10.1 to 9.1 per cent., just in the first quarter of this year. Is that what the right hon. Gentleman meant by an early pledge? To cut savings by 10 per cent. at the point in the cycle when the Chancellor should be encouraging saving took some doing. In case the Government have forgotten, yes, we told the right hon. Gentleman so.

Surely the Chancellor should have been able to work out that, if one raises a £5 billion-a-year tax on pensions and follows it with an attack on tax-exempt special savings accounts and personal equity plans, it will tend to discourage people from saving.

In case the Chief Secretary still clings to the old Labour belief that it is greedy and selfish to save for one's own and one's family's future, does not he understand the relationship between saving and investment? Even the current Treasury Ministers could not exclude entirely from the Red Book—it was tucked away in an appendix on page 94—the tell-tale number that shows growth of private investment falling in each of the years ahead.

Before the general election, investment-led growth was one of Labour's mantras, but investment and growth are both slowing down; it is all coming apart. That is not surprising, when one remembers what the Government have done to taxes. They said that they would not put them up at all—no ifs, buts or caveats—but they forgot to add—[Interruption.] Labour Members might want to listen to this, because their constituents will hold them to account. The Government forgot to add to their pledge, "unless you have a pension, a car or savings; and unless you are married, have a house or own your own business". It is not surprising that the average family is £1,000 a year worse off since May last year.

Not everyone, however, is average. We all remember the Chancellor's famous photo-opportunity at the children's party on the eve of the Budget. He may not realise it, but at children's parties these days everyone has to have something to take away: it is the party-bag culture.

Mr. Gardiner: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) to wake up the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg)?

Madam Speaker: I did not hear anyone snoring.

Mr. Maude: That famous party was held at the house of Mr. Gavyn Davies, one of the partners at Goldman Sachs. He is a lucky chap and did very well in the party-bag handout: a change in capital gains tax will leave him £16 million better off. What about the small business man and the farmer? There was no special treatment for them. They were clobbered by the Finance Bill. What was that phrase about help for the many, not the few?

Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): Will the right hon. Gentleman outline why members of his party appear to have voted in Committee on the Finance Bill for about £6 billion in tax increases, which would be about 3p on income tax?

Mr. Maude: I make no apology for the Conservative party voting against tax increases, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for pointing out the central difference between the Labour and Conservative parties: we believe in low taxes, Labour in high.

Mr. Caplin: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: If the hon. Gentleman wants to point out something else to his disadvantage, I am glad to hear from him.

Mr. Caplin: I am not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman tried to misinterpret what I said; he has done it before and no doubt he will try to do it again. I said that his party had voted for tax increases amounting to 3p in the pound—and he knows it.

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman is totally wrong. The fact is that the Government have repeatedly increased taxes since the general election, in complete breach of their clear pledge not to do so.

We heard all the tough talk about spending, but that is all that it is: talk. We now know from the summer spending statement that the Chancellor never meant it. One does not need to rely on a hostile commentator to make the point. On the Chancellor's own figures, spending is due to increase by 2.75 per cent. a year for the rest of this Parliament, and by more than 3 per cent. if we count back in the numbers that the Government have fiddled out.

Last week, Mr. Irwin Stelzer, Mr. Murdoch's economic guru, wrote:

"Then came the numbers that belie the rhetoric, the Chancellor's parliamentary statement setting out his public spending plans for the next three years. Off with this New Labour facade, on with an Old Labour suit . . . Little wonder that the monetary policy committee of the Bank of England feels it must keep raising interest rates."

No doubt that is why the Chancellor has been summoned halfway across the globe next week to account for himself—another unbreakable appointment—when he addresses the Murdoch empire in, appropriately enough, Sun valley.

For all the brave talk of reducing debt, what do we find? Even on the Chancellor's own most lavish spending option, the Red Book in March showed a debt repayment. In his Budget statement, the Chancellor was at his most thunderous on the subject:

"Stability also requires a commitment to prudence in fiscal policy. The Chancellor is above all the guardian of the people's money."

He added:

"By 2000, the Budget is forecast to be in balance."

He also said:

"To balance the Budget for one or two years and then let it run out of control in the years that follow is simply to fail those who depend on public services . . . So this, more than ever, is the wrong time to . . . compromise our commitment to long-term fiscal stability."—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1009.]

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: In a moment.

That was March; this is now. The Government now plan, even on their hugely optimistic growth projection, to repay not a single penny of debt. They are committed to a permanent Budget deficit. For all their talk of a balanced

[Mr. Maude]

Budget, the Chancellor will not reach balance even in a single year. In every year at the peak of the cycle, the Government will add relentlessly to Britain's national debt. Compare that with the same point in the cycle 10 years ago.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alistair Darling): Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that in the six years from 1990—during two of which he was Financial Secretary to the Treasury—the Tory Government doubled the national debt, with the result that we are paying £25 billion a year just to service that debt?

Mr. Maude: That is all looking into history. If the right hon. Gentleman wants to examine history, the right time to consider is the same point in the cycle 10 years ago.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: I should like to finish my point because of what the Chief Secretary said.

At the same point in the cycle 10 years ago, the then Government were repaying debt at the rate of £40 billion in today's terms. They were also increasing spending in real terms on priority services, and cutting taxes. Today, it is tax, tax, tax, and spend, spend, spend. Labour cannot be trusted with the public finances, and admits it.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: The right hon. Gentleman suggests that the Government are being profligate. Does not he agree with figures in the House of Commons Library showing that over this Parliament, and allowing for the Government's increase in expenditure, public service expenditure will increase by less than half the increase during the previous Parliament? What spending increase would the right hon. Gentleman allow, and how deep would the cuts be if he were in control of policy?

Mr. Maude: Perhaps it is a mistake to rely on Government figures, but that is what I am doing. The Government's figures provide for an increase in public spending of 2.75 per cent. above inflation over the rest of the Parliament, and, if the numbers that they have fiddled out are counted back in, it comes to more than 3 per cent. The Chief Secretary to the Treasury and the Labour party have claimed to find a magic potion, an elixir, that will provide the secret of perpetual motion. It was Labour who said that the circle could be squared so that we could have absolute fiscal rectitude and increased spending. Labour said that the way to do that was to cut welfare spending, but the Government have, on their own admission, failed to do so.

Fiona Mactaggart: The right hon. Gentleman suggests that we look back 10 years to the glorious work of the previous Government. However, he will recall that interest rates were exactly the same as now, inflation was 4.2 per cent, as it is now, and there was substantially greater unemployment than there is today. Within a year, the right hon. Gentleman's Government managed to double both interest rates and inflation, and made no serious inroad on unemployment. Does he accept that we should take no lessons from a party that wants us to look back to that?

Mr. Maude: I merely make the comparison that Labour Members invited us to make. At the top of the cycle, we had strong public finances. This Government are not even planning, on their own optimistic growth projections, a Budget that gets into balance in a single year. It was all phooey about repaying debt and getting back to a balanced Budget. They do not even do it in a single year.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) rose—

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood) rose—

Mr. Maude: I have given way often and am drawing to a close.

We always said that Labour cannot be trusted with the economy. After only 14 months, it is coming apart. Its economic policies are in disarray and the public finances are unravelling. In a moment, the Chief Secretary will begin the old familiar rant. He will chant that we will have no more stop-go or boom and bust. He will do it not once but time and again, in the inane new Labour belief that if a mantra is repeated often enough, it becomes more plausible. When Labour dreamt up the phrase, "No more boom and bust," it must have meant no more boom followed by bust, because we have boom and bust at the same time. Boom-bust, stop-go, stability, security, and the long term were just mantras.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Maude: No, I am coming to an end.

Those phrases were just mantras to persuade people that Labour could be trusted with the economy and the public finances. It is time for Labour to take responsibility for its actions and stop blaming everyone else. This is the Government's strategy. These are their choices and decisions. As the economy flags, it will be the Government's fault. It will be a downturn made in Downing street.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Alistair Darling): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"notes that the Government inherited an economy in which the current Budget was in deficit by £21 billion, inflation was set to rise because of the failure of the previous Government to take the necessary action on interest rates and nearly one in five households of working age had nobody working; recalls that the previous Government presided over a boom and bust economy with interest rates peaking at 15 per cent. and the two worst recessions since the war, doubled the national debt in the 1990s, doubled unemployment during its time in office, worsened inequality and failed to tackle the weaknesses in the British economy; commends the actions of the Government in its first year, which has established a credible framework for monetary policy that has led to the lowest long-term interest rates in 33 years, set two clear fiscal rules which provide for both prudent public finance and strong public services in the years ahead, taken action to reduce government borrowing such that the current Budget was in surplus by £1 billion in 1997–98, supported British business through cuts in corporation tax and small business tax to their lowest levels ever, launched the New Deal, the biggest employment programme for decades, reformed the tax and benefit system to tackle the unemployment and poverty traps and invested in education and skills; and notes that Britain now has a government which will ensure that the country does not return to the boom and bust and 15 per cent. interest rates of the late 1980s and early 1990s and instead has an economic policy based on stability, enterprise, employment and fairness.".

I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) for telling the House that he was about to come to the end of his speech. I congratulate him on getting in what might pass as a soundbite just before he sat down.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The House should not take lightly the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In a parliamentary democracy with an unwritten constitution such as ours, there are unwritten rules that Ministers accept their responsibility to Parliament. When the Opposition table a motion naming the Chancellor and complaining about a range of Government action and he chooses not to attend, it shows an arrogance to Parliament that we should not accept. Is there any way in which we can oblige the Chancellor to appear before us if he behaves with such insouciance?

Madam Speaker: That point was made earlier by the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude). I am sure that both his remarks and those of the hon. Gentleman have been noted by the Government.

Mr. Darling: I was going to allude to the shadow Chancellor's reference to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. The Chancellor and I discussed at length which of us should reply to the Opposition. He was upset that, in his capacity as representing Europe and the European Finance Ministers, he felt that it was appropriate to attend the European monetary affairs committee, which is traditional at the beginning and end of each country's presidency. The previous Government would have done that when they held the presidency. We believe that the Government should honour our international obligations.

The Pavlovian response of the Conservatives every time that Europe is mentioned is interesting and instructive. They cannot conceal their hostility to anything to do with Europe or any idea that a Minister of the Crown might represent Britain in Europe and thereby further our interests there. They really cannot stand it.

Instead of spending about seven minutes skirting around the subject as he taxied to the end of the runway, so to speak, before delivering his attack on us, the shadow Chancellor really ought to have considered whether the point was worth the trouble he went to. My right hon. Friend is doing precisely what the country would expect him to do: representing Britain in Europe—which is what the Conservative party did not do.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) rose—

Mr. Darling: I know that Europe always provokes a response from the hon. Gentleman, so let us hear it now.

Sir Peter Tapsell: In all seriousness, cannot the Chief Secretary understand that it is not just a question of a Pavlovian response to Europe? Some of us are Euro-sceptics, some are not; but most of us believe passionately in the sovereignty of the House of Commons. That is such an essential element of all our proceedings that if Ministers are not prepared to respect it, democracy in this country is at risk.

Mr. Darling: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that he will see and hear plenty of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in the Chamber in the not-too-distant future.

I want to deal first with the points that the Conservative motion raises—in particular, with this golden economic legacy which keeps reappearing. I then want to deal with the measures that the Government have taken, and with the one glimpse that we have had of where Conservative thinking, if that is what it can be called, is taking us.

The Tories have done this before. For 18 years, they tried to delude us into thinking that they had achieved economic success. Today, they carry on with that by claiming that they left something called a golden economic legacy—this, as my hon. Friends have pointed out, from the party which used to proclaim the economic miracle of the 1980s, which became the economic disaster of the 1990s. This is the party which delivered two of the deepest recessions since the war. The United Kingdom was one of the most unstable of all the industrialised countries. And there was a legacy of boom and bust: 15 per cent. interest rates, and interest rates in double figures for four consecutive years. There were 1 million home owners with negative equity, and record repossessions.

The right hon. Member for Horsham tells us that the right period of history to look at is 10 years ago. It is indeed an instructive time to look at, as my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart) said. After 1988, when the then Chancellor Lawson started his unsustainable boom, within two and a half years inflation had doubled to nearly 10 per cent., and interest rates had risen to record levels. There were 22 tax rises to try to contain the debt that the previous Government began to pile up. Is that a golden legacy? Are these people in any position to lecture us?

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): The Government's intention to abolish boom and bust has already been surfacing. Do the Government think that the economy is in an upswing or a downswing—or has Labour abolished the business cycle?

Mr. Darling: As we have often made clear, we are putting in place measures to ensure long-term, sustainable stability—that is what the Conservative party never managed. The Tories talk about unemployment. They are remembered for the mass unemployment of the 1980s. They left us with a country in which one household in five containing people of working age had no one in work. They talk about tax rises. This is the party which doubled VAT in 1979, having said that it would not. The Tories put VAT on fuel in 1993, having promised not to.

The golden legacy was a national debt that doubled in six years to more than £400 billion, costing us £25 billion a year to service. The Conservatives left us with a borrowing requirement of some £23 billion, a figure which we have had to get down.

Today, the Conservatives are at it again. I note that the Conservative attack was unveiled, it seems exclusively, to a national newspaper—but the bogus claims are the same as they always were. The Tories claim that a middle-income family will be worse off. It is a spurious calculation; the structure of the family chosen is far from typical, and it has changed since its last outing. A few weeks ago, the family did not smoke; now it does.

The Conservatives complain about the increases in road fuel duty, but they introduced the fuel duty escalator at 5 per cent. When the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) introduced it, he said:

"Any critic of this Government's tax plans who claims also to support the international agreement to curb carbon dioxide emissions will be sailing dangerously near to hypocrisy."—[Official Report, 30 November 1993; Vol. 233, c. 939.]

The tax rise faced by the family in the article includes rises in tobacco duty, which we have continued to impose because we, like the previous Government, believe that we should discourage smoking as a matter of public policy. It was the Conservative party which introduced that tax increase: are Conservatives now saying that they will reduce or do away with the duty, that they want to encourage smoking, and that they want to continue to damage the environment? How are they going to pay for that removal? What is their position? If they are going to criticise those measures, let them tell us what is the alternative.

As ever, the Conservatives have been highly selective. They might have told the family about some of the other measures in our Budget: the increase in child benefit for the eldest child worth £130 a year for 5.5 million families with children; the reduction in employee national insurance contributions, worth £66 a year; and the working families tax credit and the child care tax credit. All those measures will benefit families and help to make work pay. The measures in the last Budget will mean an average increase in disposable income for many families of about £100. As usual, the Tories have not given the full picture.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Darling: In the spirit of cross-party co-operation, for the moment at least, I shall give way to the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) first.

Mr. Davey: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for exposing Tory hypocrisy, but why have the Labour Government abolished the series that was released for 18 years under the Tories, showing the direct and indirect personal tax burden? When will a new series be ready?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman and his colleagues have been asking a series of parliamentary questions about those figures, and we answer those questions as quickly as possible. We have no difficulty in making available to the House the position on tax and spending.

Mr. Winnick: My right hon. Friend is dismissing the Tory claims in a characteristically robust manner, but, while he is on the subject of income and rightly showing that families have by no means been disadvantaged over the past year, will he take this opportunity to condemn the increase in income of directors of Yorkshire Water, which might act as a signal to other companies? Is it not disgraceful that people who already receive a very substantial income have increased it by at least 30 per cent? Should not that be condemned? Why not show those greedy pigs the real way by introducing another windfall tax?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend makes the point that people sitting in boardrooms are in no position to lecture those on lower incomes about the need for restraint when they do not show restraint themselves. The right hon. Member for Horsham, who was kind enough to declare his interests, which he said were in the national interest, defended some of the people who have awarded themselves exceptionally high increases. My position and that of the Government is that people sitting in boardrooms must show exactly the same restraint as they expect others to show.

In the newspaper article, the Conservatives complained about two items relating to taxation that I find interesting. First, they criticised our decision to reduce the rate at which married couple's allowance is given. That is odd because, in 1993, Norman Lamont, who was then the Chancellor of the Exchequer, said that that allowance was something of anomaly and that, because of the need to raise extra revenue, the rate was to be reduced. Given the Conservatives' action throughout the 1980s to reduce the married couple's allowance, it is curious that they should now criticise such action.

The same applies to the cuts in MIRAS, about which the right hon. Member for Horsham complains. I read what he said in 1994, when he was out of Parliament, having lost his seat in 1992. He said:

"In one of my first speeches in the House of Commons . . . I argued for the full abolition of mortgage interest relief. As Financial Secretary in 1991, I was proud to take through the Finance Bill that among other things restricted relief to the basic rate.

Yet I believe it now could and should be abolished, and there would be barely a squeak of protest."— presumably, not a squeak from himself. He added:

"The sooner it happens, the better."

What is his position? Would he abolish mortgage interest relief, or was that idea suitable only when he was outside the House? He should tell us his view.

Mr. Maude: I believe in Governments doing what they say they will do. The Government said in opposition that they would not raise taxes at all—there was no if, no but, no maybe and no caveat—and they broke their word.

Mr. Darling: I shall take the right hon. Gentleman at his word. He has given a solemn pledge in saying that the sooner MIRAS is abolished, the better. Now we know that that will be the Conservative party's policy at the next election.

Mr. Derek Twigg (Halton): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Darling: In a moment.

I wonder whether the right hon. Member for Horsham stands by something he said last week which completely undermines his complaint today. He told a Conservative party gathering that

"measured in any way you like, taxes are lower in Britain."

How on earth can he complain as he has done today? He cannot have it both ways—either taxes are lower, or they are not. The right hon. Gentleman might have thought long and hard before making his remarks last week or his remarks today, because he has used two different arguments in two weeks.

Mr. Maude: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for drawing attention to the good legacy, which the Government inherited from us, of taxes that are much lower than those elsewhere in Europe, and I am delighted that the Government have not yet managed to narrow that gap as much as they no doubt plan to do. The gap is narrowing not because others are reducing their taxes, but because the Government are increasing our taxes.

Mr. Darling: We have honoured our promises on taxation. In particular, we have made sure that where we have increased taxes, we are directing help where it is needed; for example, through the working families tax credit to families on low incomes for whom we want to help to make work pay.

Dr. Palmer: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, far from narrowing, the gap between the UK rate of corporation tax, which businesses pay, and the European rate has widened since the election?

Mr. Darling: It has, and I would be less than fair to the right hon. Member for Horsham if I did not commend him for having pointed that out to his audience last week. He said that corporation tax was low, which we achieved through our reform of the corporation tax system.

We have taken other steps to help to put the economy on a stable footing. We have set out two clear fiscal rules that will provide prudent public finance and strong public services in the years ahead. We have taken action to reduce Government borrowing, and we have put in place a more credible framework for monetary policy, which has been praised by the OECD. We have the lowest long-term interest rates for more than 33 years, as the right hon. Member for Horsham knows well. He said last week that the UK's "long-term rates are very low. Indeed our 10-year rate is lower than Germany's."

We remember that, 10 years ago, we were being lectured by the Conservative Government and told that they wanted to surpass Germany's achievement. Yet it is under a Labour Government that the UK has the lowest long-term interest rates since before England last won the world cup.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the two rules that the Government have introduced. Does he accept the view of Professor Buiter, a member of the Monetary Policy Committee, who said:

"The Golden Rule . . . has no merits as a guide to optimal borrowing"?

Mr. Darling: Professor Buiter made several comments. I strongly believe, as do most commentators, that the Government's commitment to fiscal prudence will be of the utmost importance in the years to come because, time and again, successive Governments—Conservative and Labour—have found that any attempt to expand the economy has been undermined by capacity constraints. All too often in the past, an increase in public spending has had to be reigned back as soon as the economy begins to turn the other way.

We believe that stability is the essential foundation for public services and long-term economic growth, which is why, among other actions, we cut borrowing, gave the Bank independence—which has achieved those long-term interest rates—and significantly tightened the fiscal stance by some 2.5 per cent. of national income. We have taken action to tackle the long-term weaknesses in the British economy by supporting British business, making cuts in corporation tax and setting up the new deal—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Darling: If hon. Members can contain themselves, I will give way in a moment.

The new deal is the biggest employment programme in this country for decades. Taken together, the tax cuts and the structural reforms will stand this country in good stead for the future. That essential foundation is necessary if we are to support the public spending that hon. Members on both sides of the House want.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) rose—

Mr. Darling: I will give way to the one Conservative Member here who is not a Euro-sceptic.

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, who rightly identifies me as not being a Euro-sceptic. Given that the Government are committed to endeavouring to join the euro some time at the beginning of the next century, will he clarify what effect that will have on the fiscal balance?

Fiscal prudence sounds of virginal character, but, in reality, there will be some tough decisions on the fiscal balance if there is a single monetary zone in Europe. There will be problems with, for example, trying to ensure that mortgages do not explode as interest rates fall when we join the euro. Will he abolish MIRAS? Will he raise taxation as a lever to control the balance of the economy in a fixed monetary zone? He is avoiding all those questions.

Mr. Darling: It is not the Labour Government who want to abolish MIRAS; the hon. Gentleman should have a word with his right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham. The steps that we have put in place are good for the British economy, whether or not we join the single currency. Those fiscal rules are essential for this country and its long-term economic development. We would be adopting this fiscal stance and rules whether or not there was any question of joining the euro after a referendum.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Darling: Not just now, if the hon. Gentleman does not mind. I want to make some progress, and many hon. Members want to take part in the debate.

[Mr. Darling]

I want to explore the Opposition's approach to public spending, which appears to be confused and contradictory. It is not clear whether they believe that we are spending too much or too little; and, if we are spending too much, what would they like to cut. What taxes would they like to put up? We know that the Tory Front Bench has moved to the right. As we have seen this afternoon, it is more hostile to Europe than ever before.

This week is the 50th anniversary of the national health service—one of the greatest achievements of the Labour Government of 1945. In the view of many people, it was the foundation of the welfare state. Yet look at what the shadow Chancellor has said—we must assume that he speaks for all the Tory party, because we know that it is united now. In 1995, he said:

"There is a powerful case that the growth of the Welfare State in the first half of this century went a long way towards destroying a flourishing movement of private provision of education, health, pensions and housing."

He said that at the Hayek memorial lecture—where else? It highlights the difference between the new right-wing Tory party and the Government.

The NHS embodies our values. It is more efficient, effective and fair to contribute to a health service that is there when we need it, on the basis of need and not on the ability to pay. I should be interested to know how the right hon. Gentleman squares that with what he said in 1995.

Mr. Maude: It is reassuring that the right hon. Gentleman has spent so much time reading my old speeches. There is a great deal for him to learn from them. Does he accept that the analysis that I set out in that lecture is precisely the analysis that the Minister for Welfare Reform has been putting forward?

Mr. Darling: It is no part of what my right hon. Friend the Minister for Welfare Reform has been saying. He does not believe, as the right hon. Gentleman does, that the provision of public education and health services is harmful. He would not want to go back—

Mr. Maude rose—

Mr. Darling: I will let the right hon. Gentleman intervene in a moment.

Mr. Maude: The right hon. Gentleman is misrepresenting me.

Mr. Darling: I shall let the right hon. Gentleman intervene in a moment. In 1995, he was saying that the growth of the welfare state in the first half of the century went a long way to destroy what he described as "a flourishing movement of private provision of education"

The clear implication is that he would like to return to that. Indeed, I have read some of his other speeches, in which he gives the distinct impression that the Conservative party is still wedded to private provision in education and health, and that public provision would simply be residual, for those who could not afford to pay. That is the precise inference that I take from his speech—a position from which, I believe, he has never departed.

Mr. Maude: The right hon. Gentleman has obviously been studying my speeches at great length, which is terrific, but he must not draw improper conclusions from them and certainly must not misrepresent them. The fact that the private provision and the mutual provision—the self-provision—of many of those services was harmed by the introduction of the welfare state in the first half of this century is incontrovertible. If he can provide evidence that that is not the case, let him do so. [Interruption.]

Mr. Darling: As the Economic Secretary to the Treasury and many of my other hon. Friends are saying, thank goodness for that in the health service, because a national health service to which everyone contributes, and which exists on the basis of need, not ability to pay, is the hallmark of a decent, fair and just society. If the right hon. Gentleman disagrees, I shall just have to put up with that.

I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman was complaining or complimenting me on reading his speeches, but I read some more, and I noticed that, at the Tory party conference last year—probably the best place for such a speech—he made an interesting observation:

"when a right of centre party moves to the right it can become more popular."

I suppose it is worth trying anything in the Conservative party. That seems to conflict with what Michael Portillo told the same conference; he seemed to suggest that he wanted to regain the centre, and that the Tories should be more compassionate.

I wonder what the shadow Chancellor's position is on public spending. Last year, at the Tory conference, he said:

"There is no moral content in voting for more public spending."

I wonder whether that is the view of the entire party. Let us hear it from someone more on the wing of the Conservative party than the hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor).

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): It is flattering of the right hon. Gentleman to spend so much time on the Conservative party's policies, but the sad fact is that he is Chief Secretary; he is in government. Now that he is in the public expenditure section of his speech, surely it is fair for him to say something about the implications of his public spending plans. Does 2.75 per cent. growth in spending mean higher taxes? If not, does it mean higher borrowing? Does higher borrowing mean higher interest rates? Let us have some answers on the implications of his expenditure policy.

Mr. Darling: I had always thought that one point of an Opposition day was to examine what the Opposition had to say, and I was thoroughly enjoying doing so. Only a week ago, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor set out our position at length in the Economic and Fiscal Strategy report and when, shortly, we set out the conclusions of the comprehensive spending review, the difference between the Government and the official Opposition will be clear for all to see.

However, I want to explore the point that the shadow Chancellor made when he said that there was "no moral content in voting for more public spending."

I wonder whether everyone in the Conservative party is fully on board, because it seems to me that one or two Conservative Members are off-message. The shadow Chancellor says that we have gone soft on public spending, but, given what some of his colleagues have said on health, perhaps he should tell that to some of his colleagues.

The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) said:

"The key point is that spending under this Government is less than it would have been had the Conservative party stayed in office."—[Official Report, 16 June 1998; Vol. 314, c. 183.]

So there would have been more spending under the Tories! It is not true, of course, because we have increased spending on the health service.

The shadow Health Secretary, who surely could not be accused of having no moral content in what she does, said:

"The effect that underfunding has had on the health service is now visible"—[Official Report, 16 June 1998; Vol. 314, c. 140.]— so she wants more money to be spent.

When we announced £2½ billion more in the education service, the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell)—who, sadly, is no longer on the Front Bench—said,

"Today's announcement of extra money . . . represents a sticking plaster"— so he wants to spend more public money.

The former chairman of the Tory party, the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) agrees that there should be more public spending. He said that "there is an unanswerable case for more police on the ground".—[Official Report, 15 June 1998; Vol. 314, c. 3.]

He wants more spending—despite the fact that we are still dealing with the spending plans fixed by the previous Government.

The shadow Chancellor says that there is too much public spending, whereas his colleagues say that there is too little. As my hon. Friends have pointed out, the shadow Chancellor—I know that he is new to the brief—really should have a word with his Tory colleagues serving on the Committee considering the Finance Bill. They voted for no less than £6 billion of extra spending—which is 3p on tax. They make the Liberal Democrats look a model of fiscal responsibility. The Liberals want to increase tax by only 1p to cover their modest list of promises—

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) rose—

Mr. Darling: In one moment.

The Tories have already committed themselves to 3p. I shall certainly give way to the guilty man. Although I was not there myself, I understand that, because of a breakdown in relations between the Whips, the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) was dragged back, to appear in his nightgown and hat to participate in an all-night debate. Perhaps that is why he voted for so many spending commitments.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Chief Secretary was a Committee member, but—as he has just reminded us—he could not be bothered to turn up. As I was a member and did turn up, may I remind him that, yes, we did vote and speak to reduce the tax rises in the Finance Bill? We make no apology for that. If he wants to characterise that as a tax or expenditure increase, I can only say that he has not understood the content of his own Bill.

Mr. Darling: The right hon. Gentleman still has to deal with the point that, if he votes for measures costing £6 billion, he will have to tell us what taxes would go up to replenish that revenue or, alternatively, what expenditure he wants to cut. However, he cannot do either, because it is a tax-and-spend policy without the tax.

Mr. Gibb: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Darling: No; I want to make some progress.

When one examines what the Conservatives say on public spending to one audience and what they say about it to another audience, their confusion and contradiction become apparent. The shadow Chancellor wants to move the Conservative party to the right—to make it even more popular than it is today. He seems to be hostile to the welfare state—which, he says,

"erodes the bonds of duty and compassion that hold society together."

I believe that the welfare state reinforces those bonds and that compassion.

The shadow Chancellor says that there is no moral content in voting for more public spending. So his colleagues have no moral content? However, although they want to spend more, they will not tell us how they will pay for it. It is all very confused and very contradictory.

As I told the hon. Member for West Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer) a moment ago, the Government will state our proposals in the not-too-distant future. Step by step, we are implementing our manifesto promises. We are modernising the welfare state; making work pay; reforming the labour market; and promoting enterprise and business success.

We have a fair tax system. As we have seen, today's tax claims by the Tories fall apart when we examine their actions in government and their comments in opposition. Again, the shadow Chancellor said that "measured any way you like, taxes are lower in Britain."

The Government are providing investment and reform, and sustainable and affordable public services. We are providing £2.5 billion for education, and £2 billion for the national health service. We are investing in transport. We are taking the tough decisions that are necessary for the future.

We shall publish soon the conclusions of the comprehensive spending review, which will set out the Government's priorities for this Parliament and beyond. It will offer the United Kingdom a new direction, standing in stark contrast to the divisions, confusions and contradictions that represent the Conservative party today.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Listening to the shadow Chancellor's opening speech, one rather got the impression that the Tories were not only expecting a downturn, but positively hoping for one. One really does wonder whether it is the job of the Opposition to try to talk the country into economic problems rather than to help it to get out of them—particularly as, contrary to their motion, the Tories contributed to creating some of the problems that we are now facing.

The Liberal Democrats are not surprised by the current state of the economy. I remind the House that, last July, my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) warned the Chancellor:

"Instead of shackling businesses, he should have restrained the consumer, in order to prevent the higher interest rates, higher inflation and less competitive sterling that will surely follow."—[Official Report, 2 July 1997; Vol. 297, c. 325.]

In November 1996, when responding to the last Tory Budget, my right hon. Friend said:

"Within three months, interest rates will go up . . . if they do not, the only reason will be the fact that the Government have an election coming. Within a year, tax cuts will be reversed, and within 14 to 18 months inflation will be rising sharply again."—[Official Report, 26 November 1996; Vol. 286, c. 183.]

All those predictions have come true.

The principal reason for the present situation, which makes the Tory motion so cynical and absurd, is the decision of the previous Government to keep policy so lax before the general election, as the hon. Member for Watford (Ms Ward) rightly said. The previous Government cut personal taxes in spite of record consumer windfalls, a matter which was discussed in the House and in the Treasury Select Committee, and which the then Chancellor chose to discount. They kept interest rates down in spite of buoyant consumer demand, and they refused to accept the advice of the Bank of England about the risks to inflation.

It seems a long time ago now, but there was regular speculation about the Ken and Eddie show. The argument was about who was right—Ken or Eddie. It is unfortunate that the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) is not here because at this point, he usually makes an ebullient intervention claiming that he is always right, always has been and always will be. He presumably believes that the Bank of England was always wrong and that the Government were always right.

The fact is that the results of keeping policy too easy two years ago are now coming through in high inflation, wage pressures and capacity constraints. The previous Chancellor was clear that policy worked with a lag, and that the success or otherwise of his policies would have to be judged after the passage of time. Well, time has passed and the results are now clear—Eddie was right and Ken was wrong. The Tory motion draws attention only to the legacy of the party's own policy failure and the bad old days, when interest rate policy was determined by the short-term priorities of politicians and not by the long-term interests of the country.

I find it astonishing that when operationally independent central banks are in place the world over—in almost every country in the free world—it is only the British Conservative party that wants to go back to the political manipulation of interest rates. That gave us entry into the exchange rate mechanism at the wrong moment—Black Wednesday—and the inflationary pressures under the previous Government, yet the Conservative party wants a return to the right of politicians to meddle in the short-term, day-to-day management of the economy and so damage the national interest.

In this context, the current Chancellor is to be congratulated on giving operational independence to the Bank of England and on his code for fiscal stability which, we hope, will entrench sensible rules for public borrowing. Both those changes should provide greater economic stability, lower inflation, lower interest rates and higher employment. Certainly, that is the justification for putting them in place.

As I argued on behalf of the Liberal Democrats before and during the last general election, long-term interest rates have already fallen directly because of expectations of lower inflation, which has resulted from the operational independence of the central Bank. If we secure lower levels of public borrowing, it means that when shocks to growth do occur—continued steady growth cannot be guaranteed—there is greater flexibility for fiscal policy and less risk of destabilising policy adjustments.

We welcome the changes—not surprisingly, as most of them were in our own manifesto. [Interruption.] They were, and I welcome the fact that the Labour Government have implemented policies that were in our manifesto. Indeed, it demonstrates that it is possible for an Opposition party to be influential. The only thing that was slightly odd was the inability of the Labour party during the election to acknowledge that it intended to do what we had specifically promised, but that does not in any way devalue the fact that we welcome the decision to move forward. Labour Members are happy to tease and challenge us, but, on occasion, it would be nice for the Government to acknowledge that there has been some agreement and congruence of policy, and not to try to manufacture a difference of opinion that does not exist.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) has said, one slightly worrying factor is that, on all the main series of statistics, the Government are clearly trying to manufacture discontinuity so that it will not be possible to monitor the progress of this Government and the performance of their predecessors in a like-for-like way. That is disturbing. They wish to rewrite history and draw a line at 1997.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): I know that the hon. Gentleman is trying to stop other people from pointing out differences between the parties, but this is important. May I ask him his opinion? The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey)—50 per cent. of the Liberal Democrat party representation in the Standing Committee—made an important comment on the Finance Bill. He said that the Liberal Democrats wanted to consider equalising the income tax allowance with the capital gains tax allowance, moving it up to £6,800, which would cost £17.5 billion, equivalent to 8p on the rate of income tax. Is that Liberal Democrat policy?

Mr. Bruce: The Liberal Democrats are trying to ensure that both the capital and income tax systems fall equitably and fairly according to ability to pay. We wish to lower the burden on people who have low capital gains and low income. That is a perfectly reasonable policy.

Apart from the discontinuity of statistics, there have, of course, been some controversial reactions to Government policies. Some have argued that the Bank of England, given its operational independence, has put up interest rates too sharply. Others say that the rise has come a bit too slowly. Personally, I take the latter view, but the important thing is not to second guess the authorities each month, or to criticise each twist in decision making.

There will always be controversy. Indeed, with a Monetary Policy Committee of nine members all expressing their opinions in public, we know that that debate will be carried out openly. It will be months or even years before the clear outcome of those policies can be determined, but the important thing is that monetary policy is now being run to meet the Government's inflation target, not the previous Prime Minister's re-election target, as happened two years ago. That has to be a welcome development.

Although the Chancellor has deservedly been praised for this new framework, particularly the monetary framework, he cannot entirely escape blame for our current economic problems. Although the post-election period has seen a big change in the structures, there has been much economic policy continuity, too. What was known as Clarkeism has given way to Brownism. As The Economist has argued, there is an element of continuity. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston and Surbiton described that as Clownism in the conduct of policy.

On fiscal policy, the deficit has come down, but the same relaxed approach to the taxation of consumption has continued. On the single currency, I get the feeling that the commitment to eventual EMU entry is shared more widely in the present Government than has been made public. Nevertheless, the wait-and-see strategy, or what I described once as the wait-and-wait-and-wait strategy, lives on. As a result, we suffer from the overvaluation and instability of the pound; that strategy is a substantial factor in that.

Of course, for the first two years of this Parliament, the Government's spending plans have remained fixed, preventing new measures to invest in education to start to tackle the skill shortages that are pushing up wages and threatening to abort the recovery. Education is vital not just for the quality of our society, but for our economic well-being, yet, on the Government's own figures, the proportion of gross domestic product that is spent on education has fallen from 4.9 per cent. before the election to 4.7 per cent. after, despite the fact that the Prime Minister said that education spending would increase in real terms as a percentage of GDP year on year under Labour—clearly a broken promise.

On that issue, I feel that both the Prime Minister and Treasury Ministers cannot go on getting away with trying to pretend that Liberal Democrat policies and priorities should be frozen in aspic as of 1 May last year, while Government spending and Government information are updated. We have, of course, made it absolutely clear that, on the basis of our commitments and the revisions that we have applied to those in the light of information that has become available since the general election, this party supports very much more substantial investment in education—and in health as well—than anything that the Government have pledged.

Mr. Darling: I do not like to interrupt this congruence of policy to which the hon. Gentleman has referred, but I cannot let him get away with what he has just said. What is undoubtedly true is that Liberal Democrat policy is not frozen in aspic—if, indeed, that is what people do with aspic—because every time we announce an increase in spending, the Liberal Democrats call for even more. We are spending more now, despite the fact that we said that we would hold to the inherited expenditure totals in the first two years. We are spending £2.5 billion more on education, educational maintenance and new building than the Liberal Democrats promised. It is true to say that, since then, they have upped the ante, and I expect that they will continue to do that. The difference between us and them is that we have to finance it and we are capable of financing it. I doubt whether the hon. Gentleman is.

Mr. Bruce: I must take absolute issue with the right hon. Gentleman on education. Our commitment on education is several times what the Government have so far pledged—[Interruption.] No; it always was. The commitment to put the equivalent of 1p on income tax for education over the entire Parliament is a substantially bigger commitment than the Government have made. That is a fact on which I stand firmly.

On the updating, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is right. Of course, I accept that it is not credible to make pledges unless we are prepared to demonstrate where the money should come from, but, in the light of the improving finances that the Government have benefited from, we have certainly said that some of that money could and should have gone into health and education, whereas the Government have stuck to a policy of keeping the squeeze on those services in the first two years and then throwing substantially more money at them later, which we believe is damaging and may yet prove inflationary.

Already, the inflationary figures on which the Chief Secretary's forecasts are based have proved to be unrealistically low. He is running at a higher rate of inflation than the Chancellor's first Budget forecast and the inflationary pressures are upwards. If that continues, what will be the real effect on the commitment on expenditure on public services? Perhaps I could put it the other way around. At what point will the Government recognise that they have to review what their commitment will deliver? The argument is about not just who will spend more money—that is sterile and unproductive—but what we wish to deliver.

I accept that the Government are right to identify specific outputs or inputs, such as reduced class sizes and reduced waiting lists. Our contention is that, first, those have not been delivered and it may be difficult to deliver them. Secondly, they are modest aspirations which we wish to improve on. We have identified the fact that most people would like class sizes to come down well below 30 throughout the primary school sector, not just in the first three classes. Most people want hospital waiting times to be shorter, not just waiting lists. Those are all things that will require resources and the motivation of highly qualified, highly skilled people, who will not be retained in the public services if they face pay cuts year on year, which is this Government's policy.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the latest figure in the national accounts for quarter one GDP, year on year, is up 2.9 per cent., which is above the long-term GDP trend of about 2 per cent? The economy is booming above and beyond the rate set of

[Mr. Geraint Davies]

2.75 per cent. for public expenditure, which was mentioned by the Opposition. The problem is keeping the economy on a stable, growing footing, not the problems that the hon. Gentleman mentions.

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman is right in the sense that, at the moment, the economy is doing well. There are clear concerns on the horizon about whether that can be sustained. There is so much that the Government can do; there are things that are outside their control. Our contention is that it would have been wiser to have a more even flow of funding into public services, rather than to keep the stranglehold on—and then attempt to push money into them perhaps faster than they can absorb, and when the economy may be experiencing greater inflationary pressures.

The Chancellor is very keen to squeeze boom and bust out of the management of the economy, and he has adopted policies that he believes will lead in that direction. We agree with him on that. Unfortunately, his policies on the public services run the risk of creating a bust and boom that may prove equally unsustainable. Our critique of the situation bears some examination, and I stand by our record.

To tackle our economic problems, we must invest more in education and training. Without that, each recovery burns itself out on higher wages and inflation. The pressures are appearing already, despite still high unemployment, particularly in certain regions.

The Chancellor has made grave mistakes on fiscal policy. He raised taxes substantially and predictably after the election. Had the Conservatives won the election, I suspect that taxes would have gone up in the same way, although they did not say that they would do that either. Sensitive to the promises made on tax, the Chancellor has put the burden almost wholly on hard-pressed businesses and on savers rather than on high-spending consumers. The only consumer tax rises have been modest. The balance that the Chancellor has struck has not helped to bear down on inflation, which is his main problem.

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): One of the tax changes that the Government introduced was the windfall tax. Its key objectives were to ensure that we had a better-trained work force and to give people opportunities. The Liberal Democrats opposed the tax. They want the spending, but they oppose the means. Does the hon. Gentleman support the spending, and how would his party have raised the money?

Mr. Bruce: It is fine for the hon. Gentleman to say that, but I can reverse the challenge. We were committed to putting money into education and putting 1p on income tax, which his party opposed. As a consequence, education has been chronically underfunded. There is a legitimate debate between parties about priorities. We have made ours clear and the Government have made theirs clear. Some of the new deal spending from the windfall tax is not delivering all the results that were promised, not least because the situation is changing under the Government's feet.

I am conscious that the debate finishes at 7 o'clock, so I shall bring my remarks to a close soon. Relying on interest rates, which is the consequence of the Chancellor's fiscal stance, has forced the pound up further and unbalanced the economy even more. The one issue on which I agree with the shadow Chancellor is that we are creating a boom and a bust at the same time—a boom in the consumer sector and a bust in manufacturing. The Government's economic policies are undermining our wealth-creating base. A clear commitment to the single currency would have helped the Government and our exporters by stabilising the pound at a more competitive level and easing pressures on interest rates. It is not too late for the Government to take such issues on board.

Where the Chancellor has genuinely put the economy first, he has done well. The operational independence of the Bank of England is the best example. Where politics have come top, economic policy has been blown off course. There has been no fiscal tightening for the consumer, to avoid frightening new Labour voters. There has been no stability for the pound, to keep Mr. Murdoch, sweet. There has been no extra investment in education, to stick to Tory spending levels for political reasons. The Tories are not in a strong position, given their record, their pre-election economic policy and their lack of an agenda since the election. However, the Chancellor has to strengthen his nerve if he is to tackle the problems head-on. He must adopt a less relaxed fiscal policy, make a real commitment to education and deal with exchange rate stability, which he always refuses to talk about. Those issues must be addressed if we are to secure sustainable, long-term growth, which Liberal Democrats and the Government want and the country needs. The Liberal Democrats have set out their policies. The Government have acknowledged and adopted some of them and would do well to consider others to help secure the stability, long-term success and prosperity that we all want.

Ms Helen Southworth (Warrington, South): The Opposition have called the debate in the hope of re-creating themselves in the public eye. They want to rewrite history, pretending that the Tory Government created a golden age and a dynamic economy. Maybe they are even pretending that they created a fair society. They seem to be hoping for collective national amnesia on a grand scale. They hope that we shall all join them in the land of make-believe. I am afraid that they are away with the fairies; they are in never-never land. Tory Britain was never how they say that it was, and they will never get the British people to believe them.

Let us look at the reality of what the Tories did to the economy when they were in power. The defining moment of the previous Tory Government was 16 September 1992—Black Wednesday. The Chancellor, the Prime Minister and the Government panicked. They took interest rates up by 2 per cent., immediately followed by a further 3 per cent. rise. While they were losing their heads, they were losing billions of pounds for this country. They provided management schools round the world with a text book case of how to cause chaos, then how to make it worse.

Then, in the 1993 Budget, the Tories were desperate to make up the money that they had wasted. They started raising taxes and put VAT on fuel, when Britain had more winter deaths among old people from hypothermia and cold-related illnesses than any other European country. That showed Tory priorities. Then they declared a beef war with the European Union over its response to the BSE crisis that their mismanagement had created. They called the war off a month later with nothing gained, leaving British beef farmers and taxpayers paying the cost for years. The Tory Government brought the dreaded words "negative equity" into common parlance, which haunted middle-income families. One thousand homes a week were repossessed during the last months of their Government.

During the Tory years, Britain's manufacturing base declined from 58 to 28 per cent. of the economy, and the Conservatives took no effective action to restructure, reskill and stabilise industry. While the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) was Prime Minister, more than 8 million British people experienced unemployment at least once. Job insecurity became endemic. That is what people remember about Tory Britain.

Another first: until the right hon. Member for Huntingdon became Prime Minister, all the Governments in the history of the United Kingdom had borrowed a cumulative total of £190 billion. Despite receiving £120 billion from North sea oil and £80 billion from asset sales, the Government of the right hon. Member for Huntingdon added more than £180 billion to the national debt in less than six years. That is a phenomenal and appalling achievement—truly one to remember. British taxpayers have to spend £25 billion a year on repaying the interest on that debt alone and they are still feeling the consequences.

The Tories were in government for 18 years and gave us the most unstable economy in the developed world, growth rates below those of every other European country and the two deepest and longest recessions in post-war history. The right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) was querying boom and bust. He could not remember what it meant. The Tories had boom and bust, constantly changing policies, repeated rows over Europe, no plans, no strategy and no vision. When business was asking for urgent action on the skills gap, the previous Government reduced the training budget by £34 million in real terms. When business was asking for investment, they crossed their fingers and hoped that something would happen. When business was asking for action on transport, they came up with the cones hotline.

Just before last May's election, The Economist said of the right hon. Member for Huntingdon:

"his chief problem is that he leads a party which has taken leave of its senses."

This afternoon, that party is in its proper place: on the Opposition Benches. It has a new leader, but it is the same party. Who are the Tories in opposition? They are newborn babes; they have no recollection of the mess that they created. They are innocents who bear no responsibility for Black Wednesday, the skills gap, the investment gap, the doubling of national debt, the billions of pounds that were wasted and the millions of people out of work.

When it comes to the present economic strategy, what do these people say? They look at our public spending review and say that we must cut public spending. They look at our Finance Bill and say that we must increase public spending. They oppose reforms to close tax loopholes, but say that we must do more to close such loopholes.

Mr. Gibb: The hon. Lady was a member of the Committee that considered the Finance Bill. Will she give an example in that Committee of an occasion on which the Opposition called for a public spending increase?

Ms Southworth: I would be very happy to send the hon. Gentleman a list of the many more than 20 occasions on which Tory amendments would have increased public expenditure and reduced Government income.

We do not know—who does?—what the Tories say about Europe; that changes by the minute. In opposition, as in government, the Tories do not know where they are going; they have no coherent plan, no vision and no agreement among themselves. On top of that, it seems that, in the Finance Bill Committee, they could not add up. They were not credible as a Government and they are not credible as an Opposition. If they hope that the electorate will not notice, Conservative Members, like their new leader, will catch a cold.

By radical contrast, this Government are putting in place an overall economic strategy with discipline and effectiveness. Our central economic objective is high but stable growth with greater job opportunities, so that everybody can share in higher living standards. We are rebuilding the economic infrastructure, creating new partnerships between Government and industry to address the problems of instability that we inherited and to build prosperity. Our policies are clear. We are securing economic stability by ensuring low inflation and sound public finance. We are encouraging work, providing employment opportunities for all and making work pay. We are raising productivity by improving skills, increasing investment, ensuring that markets are accessible and competitive and encouraging research and development.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Southworth: If you are still in you seat, you cannot be asking me to give way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Lady must not refer to the Chair in that way.

Ms Southworth: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I meant to say that the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) cannot be asking me to give way if he is still in his seat.

Ms Southworth: I will not give way at the moment.

Current economic indicators show that our strategy is already beginning to take effect. Public sector borrowing, excluding the windfall tax, was £5.9 billion in 1997–98—down to 0.7 per cent. of gross domestic product. Next year, it is projected to be £1.3 billion—0.2 per cent. of GDP, compared with the massive borrowing of 8 per cent. in 1993–94. Despite increases in short-term interest rates, long-term interest rates have fallen sharply since the Government introduced the new policy framework in May. The rates are now at their lowest level for more than 30 years. Real personal disposable income is up by 5 per cent. on last year.

I should like to comment on some examples of the effectiveness of the Government's management of the economy that are particularly important to my constituents. Over the past year, I have discussed priorities with the Confederation of British Industry, the Federation of Small Businesses, chambers of commerce and business people in my constituency. Business people in small and medium businesses right through to multinationals know that people are the key to success. They all recognise the drag on business, profitability and growth caused by the skills gap.

[Ms Southworth]

The Tory inheritance meant that, in Britain, less than half the number of students attained good grades at GCSE than in France or Germany. We were 42nd in the education league. Thousands of young people were trying to find jobs without basic literacy and numeracy skills. Such young people have the right to decent education and a decent opportunity in life. This Government—my Government—are tackling the skills shortage with imagination and vigour. Our careful and coherent plans for managing the economy are inclusive, and they draw on the experience and expertise of business. The new deal for young people has been designed with the active support and co-operation of industry and business. It is already working to give young people a step up the skills ladder.

Mr. Geraint Davies: My hon. Friend will be interested to know that, in Croydon, only on Friday, I spoke to an audience of more than 100 businesses that are interested in the Government's new deal. That is symptomatic of the new partnership between the Government and business to get our people back to work.

Ms Southworth: As my hon. Friend would expect, I am very pleased to hear that. Indeed, I heard the same message in a business breakfast this morning.

We know that the new deal is effective because 60,000 young people have joined it since January. Indeed, we are already receiving an enthusiastic and interested response to today's launch of the new deal for over 25s. We are also investing £100 million in opening 40 centres of technical excellence. We are training 20,000 people to tackle the millennium bug which, as one of my constituents said, is one of those normal problems that will not go away, which small and medium businesses need the Government's help to tackle, and which the previous Government ignored.

We are creating a culture of lifelong learning with an infrastructure that helps people access knowledge and skills. In addition—an issue that is brought up constantly by my constituents who are business people—we have committed £2.5 billion extra to education, and will increase that spending year on year as the economy grows.

That brings me to another area of exceptional importance to many of my constituents. After the Warrington bombing, local people worked hard to support a framework for peace in Northern Ireland. They have raised £1 million in the past three months to build an international peace centre for young people from north and south Ireland and England. A peaceful future for Northern Ireland really matters to us. The £315 million invested in the renewal and modernisation of Northern Ireland, which the Government have allocated to build economic and political stability, get people back to work, equip them with skills and create an infrastructure for a modern economy, effectively shows the Government's priorities. Economic growth and social cohesion are working together to build a better present and a better future for the people of all these islands.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle): The House has just heard a most powerful, fluent and charmingly delivered speech from the hon. Member for Warrington, South (Ms Southworth), to which I listened with great interest. It used to be a tradition in the House that one replied to the previous speaker, so I shall deal first with one or two of her points.

The hon. Lady is quite wrong in thinking that none of us Conservatives has a recollection of events leading up to British entry into the exchange rate mechanism and those flowing from it. I was strongly opposed to, and argued strongly against, joining the ERM. During the two years that we were in it, I continually urged that we should leave. To this day, I regard so-called black Wednesday as one of the most fortunate events in post-war British economic history. However, throughout the late 1980s, day-in, day-out, the Labour party strongly urged the then Conservative Government to join the ERM. I remember Neil Kinnock, then Leader of the Opposition, and John Smith, then shadow Chancellor, urging in the twice-weekly Prime Minister's Question Time—Prime Ministers used to come to the House twice a week—that Britain join the ERM.

I may say in an aside to the Liberal economic spokesman, the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), that the Bank of England was also strongly in favour of our joining the exchange rate mechanism, as was much of the City of London and the great international firms. In other words, exactly the same people who were then in favour of our joining the ERM are now urging us to join the single European currency, and for the same reasons.

One of the extraordinary things about the highly intelligent remarks of the hon. Member for Warrington, South is that she seems not to appreciate, given the very things for which she was criticising the Conservative Government in the past—I fully recognise that it was a terrible mistake for us to join the ERM—that her Government are now seriously contemplating making exactly the same mistake again.

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford): Is it not the case that, when the Conservative Government went into the exchange rate mechanism, they went in at too high a rate and with a take-it-or-leave-it attitude that meant that we had no friends in the arrangement when the crisis arose? If anything, that was an example of the way in which the Conservative party dealt with the European Community throughout its period in office. The disaster that followed was the sort of disaster that would follow any policy that the Conservative Government took up, with that sort of bullying manner.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I fully accept—events demonstrated it all too clearly—that we joined the ERM at the wrong rate of DM2.95 to the pound. However, there will never be a right rate at which to join any fixed exchange arrangement. The essence of international currency markets, as we have seen in the relationship, for example, between the yen and the dollar in the past month, is that currencies can fluctuate dramatically from day to day and week to week. That is one of the great safety mechanisms in the international trading community. When we remove that mechanism, we are in serious trouble.

That is one of the reasons why the whole of Asia is now in chaos. The countries involved were operating on quasi-fixed exchange rates throughout so they did not devalue and did not change their exchange rates until they were in a desperate situation. In my view, that is exactly what will happen in the European Union in the course of time.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the high level of sterling is a symptom of international business confidence in the British economy? Given what his colleagues have said about getting the exchange rate down, how would he suggest reducing the confidence of the international business community in the British economy so as to push down exchange rates, which it appears the Conservative Opposition want to do by some sort of whim?

Sir Peter Tapsell: I am being delayed in getting on with what I really want to say. However, I am much more interested in the subjects that are being raised.

It is true, to some extent, that the great strength of sterling today is due to the high regard that the international community has for the state of the British economy at present, as a result of 18 years of Conservative government. However, it is not true that the whole British economy is very confident at present. The exporting element of the economy has a lower confidence than at any time since 1983, as the latest CBI report proves.

Much of the strength of sterling is due to the fact that people are anxious about the future of the euro. A great many rich Germans have been moving out of deutschmarks into the Swiss franc, the United States dollar and sterling. To a considerable extent, the strength of sterling is due to anxieties about the euro by the international community.

The other thing, while I am on this subject—having referred to it, I shall conclude on the question of the past, as it were, and the euro—is that it is not possible to say what would be the right rate at which to join the euro, if the Labour Government eventually decide to join and the British people are unwise enough to vote yes in a referendum. At the moment, the exchange rate with the deutschmark is significantly higher than when we joined the ERM. It was 3.02 this morning, not 2.95. No one who looks at these matters has ever seriously considered that we should join the euro at a higher rate than 2.65, and many would put it at 2.60, or even lower.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor), who does not always share my euro-sceptic enthusiasms, mentioned earlier, we are talking about a problem that the Labour Government seem not to have considered. Certainly they do not discuss it in public. If they decide to join the euro and they are to avoid the mistake that the Conservative Government made of joining at much too high a rate, how will they get sterling down from DM3 to the pound to 2.60 without greatly increasing inflation? They would have to reduce interest rates—the experts guess that it would involve a reduction in interest rates of 3 or 3.5 per cent. It is said that that would involve a huge increase in income tax to offset the inflationary pressures that would ensue. Even if we decided in theory that we wanted to join the euro, it seems to me that there are almost insuperable technical problems just about that aspect of it.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Is it not the case that, in the middle of May, the exchange rate slipped from DM3.10 to the pound to 2.90 due to the agreement of leaders in Europe to set a date for the start of the new currency? Is it not therefore obvious that, if the currency is successful following its launch at the beginning of next year, the rate for the pound will converge down towards 2.65 anyway?

Sir Peter Tapsell: I do not think that anything is ever certain about the movement of currencies. I have earned my living in this sector, often with some difficulty, for 40 years. If one even knew what the exchange rates of the world were to be tomorrow, one could become another Soros overnight. It is absurd to project forward months ahead what would be the possible rates at which the great currencies would relate to one another.

I turn to the terms of the motion of censure that my party has rightly put on the Order Paper. The Chief Secretary advanced the rather curious and, I should have thought, entirely novel constitutional proposition that an Opposition censure motion was an opportunity for the Opposition to set out their policies. I have listened to a great many Opposition motions over the past 40 years in the House and it has never seemed to me that that was the object of the movers of such motions.

I have always thought that a censure motion on a Government was exactly what it said, and that it set out the criticisms that the Opposition of the day have of the Government. The Government are then expected to defend their policies and answer in detail the criticisms that have been made. There has been no attempt to answer our criticisms in detail and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has even pushed off to continental Europe. It is extraordinary. It is not surprising that the Chief Secretary wants us to start behaving as though we were the Government, which I have no doubt that we shall be again in a few years' time.

When the economic historians come to study the reasons for the failure of this Government, I believe that they will point to the origins of the failure arising on the fourth day of the Government's life, when they suddenly announced the new arrangements for the Bank of England. The whole of that episode will be of great fascination to political and economic historians. That immensely important decision, incidentally, reversed at a stroke a Labour Act of Parliament, not a Conservative one. It reversed the Bank of England Act 1946, which was introduced by the post-war Labour Government.

The decision was taken furtively and in a tremendous hurry. The policy was not in the Labour party's manifesto, and, in the campaign before 1 May, no Labour Front Bencher said that such a decision would be taken. Indeed, I understand that it was not even discussed and approved by the Labour shadow Cabinet before 1 May. However, it was one of the most important constitutional and economic decisions of this century—indeed, since the reign of Charles II, as anyone who knows the history of the Bank of England will accept—and it was taken in what David Smith, the economics editor of The Sunday Times, described yesterday as a frenetic hurry. It will have tremendous implications for the duration of the Labour Government and will, I believe, have very adverse effects on the British people.

The effect of giving the Bank of England independent operation on interest rates is—as I have said repeatedly in the House from the moment that it was announced—to separate fiscal and monetary policy. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) pointed out that a number of major countries separate fiscal and monetary policy, but sometimes the number is exaggerated—Japan does not separate the two, although I do not want to use Japan as an example for us to follow. People are usually thinking of the United States and Germany, but we should consider the effects of that separation on those countries' recent economic history.

Nye Bevan, who was the best speaker that I have heard during my time in the House, was fond of saying that one did not have to look into the crystal ball when one could read the book. Recent books show that the United States ran a slack fiscal policy and a tight monetary policy in the 1980s, and that Germany did so in the 1990s, after the Berlin wall came down. The slack fiscal policy in Germany required a tight monetary policy as a counterpoise, which was the cause of all our difficulties as a member of the exchange rate mechanism. The fact that interest rates had to be high in Germany meant that they were inappropriately high in Britain at a time when we were entering deep recession, which—or the reverse—is exactly what might happen if we were in a single European currency. An economy can be organised much more efficiently if elected Ministers are responsible for both fiscal and monetary policy.

Mr. Beard: Is it not the case that, immediately after the Monetary Policy Committee took control of interest rates, long-term interest rates fell? That fall, which was the result of the policy about which the hon. Gentleman complains, had a direct impact on one of the longest-standing problems of the British economy—the lack of investment.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Treasury Ministers have often made that point, but I do not think that they understand—any more than I think that the hon. Gentleman understands—the significance of long-term interest rates. It is perfectly true that long-term interest rates in this country are exceptionally low—they are at 6 per cent. In the United States, however, which has a totally different system and is not preoccupied with the things that we are discussing, long-term interest rates are 5.5 per cent.—that is almost a post-war low. One can, this afternoon, buy the 30-year US long benchmark bond on a 5.6 per cent. yield. In Japan, which also faces a totally different set of circumstances—it is in technical recession, perhaps moving into slump—long-term interest rates are even lower.

There can be a variety of reasons to explain the fact that long-term interest rates are low. People may fear a recession and savers may not be spending. There are many influences on long-term interest rates, and it is a great mistake to make deductions of the kind that the Government make from the fact that our fixed interest yield curve is more or less flat and that our long-term interest rates are low—one would have to make a close and scholarly comparison between Britain and the United States if one wanted to draw such academic conclusions.

The fact that the Government sacrificed control over monetary discipline—they can no longer determine it—means that the Chancellor can pursue a laxer fiscal policy than he otherwise could. I suppose that he was so keen to give the Bank of England independence over interest rates because he knew that, sooner or later, political pressures would force him to increase public expenditure, contrary to the pledges that he gave before the general election—he wanted to be able to blame another body for the increase in interest rates. There have already been six increases in interest rates since the general election, as the motion points out, and there are undoubtedly more to come. The effects of those increases are serious and extremely damaging to our exports. Indeed, I fear that sterling will become even stronger and that the high pound will persist for many months. The impact of that on the green pound will have a tremendously bad effect on British agriculture. We always talk about this problem in terms of exporting, but I represent an agricultural constituency and I know that farmers are having a desperate time as a result of Government policy.

The Chancellor has now announced a 2.75 per cent. increase in public expenditure per annum, but, when he is challenged on it, he says what I have heard Chancellors say time and again over the years—the deja vu that I experience in listening to him and the Chief Secretary is uncanny. Last Thursday, in response to a supplementary question, the Chief Secretary said:

> "When the Tories . . . accuse us of going on a spending spree or of having too loose a fiscal policy, they really must tell us, what do they want us to cut? Are we spending too much on health, too much on education, too much on transport? They must answer those questions."—[Official Report, 25 June 1998; Vol. 314, c. 1161.]

No Opposition have ever answered those questions, but I tell the House who has—first, between 1964 and 1967 under the Wilson Government, they were answered by the international community, which forced the 1967 Callaghan devaluation of the pound, and secondly, between 1974 and 1976, when Lord Healey was Chancellor, they were answered by the International Monetary Fund, which told the Labour Government how the show was to be run.

I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), who was a Treasury Minister at the time, is temporarily not here, as he could confirm that, after the IMF had told the Government what to do, the quartet of Labour Treasury Ministers imposed the most savage cuts on all the public services. The Chief Secretary asks what services Opposition Members would cut and reads out all the popular public services on which the Liberals ask him to spend more. Those were precisely the services—health, education, transport and so forth—that the IMF cut most savagely under the last Labour Government. No new hospitals or roads were built: new building was cancelled—the whole thing.

I hope that we shall not have to listen for another three or four years to Treasury Ministers saying, whenever they increase public expenditure, "What would you cut?" I have never been one of those Conservatives who opposed public expenditure in principle. I am a Keynesian—I believe in public expenditure when it can be justified. One has to be careful not to increase public expenditure too quickly or out of line with GDP indexes.

Indeed, until his extraordinary statement on the matter a fortnight ago, I thought that the chief message that the so-called iron Chancellor had for the country was that public expenditure had to be kept under the tightest possible control. However, because of a few minor revolts by a few Labour Members whom the Government are now trying to strike off their candidates list, that iron Chancellor was panicked almost overnight into announcing that restraints would be considerably eased. We shall wait to find out how long it is before the IMF starts to take an interest.

The shadow Chancellor said the other day that we have boom and bust at the same time, which is true. The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development said only last week that our latest increase in interest rates might well tip this country into recession, and I share that view. On 27 November last year, in a supplementary question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I asked:

"Has it occurred to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that by 1999 the danger of inflation may be rather less than the danger of deflation?"—[Official Report, 27 November 1997; Vol. 301, c. 1082.]

That is my view, and I said that before the Thai baht collapsed and before the chaos in Indonesia and the economic crisis in Asia. The dangers of deflation are demonstrably much greater now than they were in November, and the latest increase in interest rates by the Bank of England was a mistake.

The Bank will make further mistakes, which brings me back to my opening remarks. I do not have much confidence in the new Monetary Policy Committee that has been set up to run such affairs instead of the elected Government. Members of the MPC are mostly respected economists, but they do not have wide business experience—certainly not in exporting—and they are not at all preoccupied with employment levels as far as one can tell.

When the Chancellor announced the new Bank of England set-up, he said that its chief obligation would be to keep inflation at 2.5 per cent. If Labour Members are right that he felt when he came to office that he had inherited from the Conservatives far too lax a monetary policy and that an inflationary danger was building up so that a 2.5 per cent. inflation target had to be announced, surely he must have understood the implications. If one suddenly introduces a 2.5 per cent. target at the beginning of an inflationary splurge—this is what Treasury Ministers are now trying to pretend that they thought—one is, in effect, asking the Bank of England to take severe monetary measures indeed, which will dramatically affect employment levels. It is worth remembering that the level of unemployment under every one of the five previous Labour Governments has been higher when they left office than when they took it, and I am certain that that will again be the case.

Maria Eagle: Does the hon. Gentleman recall the effect of Conservative economic policies on manufacturing employment between 1979 and 1981, particularly in Liverpool, which I remember well at the time? They destroyed 24 per cent. of manufacturing jobs and one sixth of all jobs in Liverpool.

Sir Peter Tapsell: I remember that clearly because I resigned as a Treasury Front-Bench spokesman on the issue and spent the period from 1979 to 1981 attacking Lady Thatcher's Government and Lord Howe's chancellorship precisely on the grounds that their monetary policy was far too tight. I publicly described the 1981 Budget on the day that it was delivered as being economically illiterate. When Sir Alan Walters was eventually appointed as her economic adviser by Lady Thatcher, his first report to her confirmed exactly what I said and she changed her policies.

Getting things wrong once is not a good argument for getting them wrong a second time. We made great mistakes over the exchange rate mechanism and excessive monetarism, but, apparently, this new Government have learnt nothing. They are the Bourbons of modern times—they have learnt absolutely nothing—and, as the Talleyrand of the House, I am trying to remind hon. Members that we faced some of those problems before, and the wrong answers were given. For goodness' sake, do not let us do so again.

One of the great problems is that people develop a commitment to a general theory. During my time in the House, the theories have changed. First, we had socialism, then corporatism, then monetarism and now we have Euro-federalism. One of the great advantages of an Oxbridge training, which is under considerable attack from Labour, is that it develops in one a mood of intellectual scepticism at an early age. I was deeply sceptical about all those four "isms". We really should aim for a situation in which all "isms" are "wasms" and in which we concentrate on good, sound Government by experienced Ministers rather than thinking that all the world's problems can be solved by one theory.

Finally, every Government ought to aim at four things simultaneously. I am thinking of the 1944 all-party White Paper at the end of the war. People go on as though the Labour Government invented everything after 1945 and one would not think that there had been a Beveridge report on the social services, a Willink report on the health service or anything of the sort. George Isaacs and Nye Bevan did a good job, but a lot of work was done for them beforehand. They inherited the blueprints for the post-war welfare state, including the educational structure, which was based on Rab Butler's Education Act 1944, and it was built on plans that had been drawn up under Churchill's wartime Government, largely by Conservative Ministers.

The 1944 White Paper on employment stated that one must aim simultaneously for stable prices, a high level of employment, a healthy balance of payments and an expanding economy. If one gives a particular instruction to the monetary authorities—now the Bank of England—as this Government have and tells them that they have to give a 2.5 per cent. rate of inflation overriding priority, those other three aims will all be put at risk and this Government will come to the ignominious end that I am longing to see.

Mr. Michael J. Foster (Worcester): It is perhaps in the nature of debates on a censure motion, but Ministers will be grateful to the hon. Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir P. Tapsell), and the faces of Opposition Front Benchers show that they were not too keen to hear his relatively interesting contribution.

The Government are hoping to achieve long-term economic stability. Businesses share that aim; they want to avoid boom and bust, with the peaks and troughs of economic activity. I think that everyone in the House will understand the analogy of a small ship that does not want deep, heavy waves, because there might be the occasion when one rides the crest like a surfer and has super-success but, more often than not, businesses will be wiped out when the wave crashes down.

Between 1991 and 1993, nearly 70,000 companies were liquidated: wiped out. In the same period, there were 170,000 business failures.

Mr. Gibb: Will the hon. Gentleman comment on the Dun and Bradstreet report, published today, showing that business failures among small companies have increased by 25 per cent. under the Labour Government?

Mr. Foster: The popularity of the new Labour Government among business people is as high as it has ever been.

Stability in the economy is a great aid to planning. Certainty is essential when we plan long-term investment in new technology, in research and development, or even in people. That is why I welcome the news that long-term interest rates are at historically low levels. We must acknowledge the fact that there will be some variation in our economy. We are not operating in a closed economy. The essence of good government is to avoid economic shocks and destabilisation.

"6 increases in interest rates",

but those increases have raised the base rate only 1.5 percentage points, from 6 to 7.5 per cent. As regrettable as that may be, we should consider what happened when the Conservative Government were in charge of the economy. In one day alone, they raised interest rates first by 2 per cent., and then by a further 3 per cent. The base rate was in double figures for four consecutive years; in 1989, it peaked at 15 per cent., remaining between 13 and 15 per cent. throughout 1989 and 1990, yet Conservative Members have the brass neck to criticise the Labour Government, under whom interest rates have peaked at only 7.5 per cent.

In Worcester, business has welcomed the new Labour Government. On our first anniversary, BBC Television came to find out what Worcester woman, Worcester man and Worcester business people thought. Mr. Noel Duffy, finance director of Dolphin Computer Systems, said how much he applauded what the Government were doing for business.

A stable economic environment will be essential in addressing the fundamental problems that we inherited from the previous Government. The most obvious problem is that economic growth is more often than not associated with wage-push inflation. That effect is caused partly by skills shortages, as workers can bid for higher wages when they know that their skills are in demand and there is no competition from other skilled workers.

The Government are addressing that serious supply-side problem. A Japanese-owned manufacturing tool company, Mazak, has its European headquarters in Worcester. It has great difficulty in explaining to its Japanese owners that, when it takes on new workers, productivity does not immediately go up and it takes six months before there is any noticeable increase. That is because the workers who are being taken on do not have the skills or education standards of their German or Japanese counterparts.

I am pleased to say that the Government are addressing such problems. The university for industry will enable people in work to train and to develop their skills, and will give access to the best possible management practice. Individual learning accounts will enable people to take the time to bring themselves up to speed with new skills. That is good for their motivation, for the business, which will benefit from greater productivity, and for the economy as a whole. The new deal will give quality training to unemployed people and bring them back into work, not only making work pay for them but making taking on workers pay for businesses.

We have endeavoured to improve education standards across the board, with nursery provision for all four-year-olds; the pledge on small class sizes for five, six and seven-year-olds; a focus on literacy and numeracy; and encouragement for more young people to go into further and higher education. That is all absolutely essential if we are to solve the problems that we inherited.

For many years, the economy has been troubled and unable to grow without causing the bust part of the business cycle to come into play. We intend to tackle that problem through a stable economic plan and I hope that, after 20 years of Labour government, we shall be able to look back on what will truly be a golden legacy.

Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): It is incredible that the Chancellor has chosen to be elsewhere for such an important debate. That shows some contempt for Parliament, and may say a great deal to businesses that have been looking to him for leadership. Everywhere, we see signs that the economy is in severe difficulties, but he cannot be bothered to come to the House.

Over the past few weeks, report after report, including the most recent one from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, has warned of real danger in the economy, yet the way in which the Government and their Back Benchers have responded this afternoon shows complete contempt for the warnings that have been offered. The economy is in real peril. While the Chancellor fiddles, the economy burns.

It is an extraordinary fact that inflation has almost doubled in the past year, yet Government Members want to talk about history. The reality is that the economy requires leadership and attention today, but the Government are deaf to all pleas. Mortgage interest payments have increased by almost 30 per cent. since the Government came to power, but they are deaf to our arguments. We have seen excise duties increase by nearly 20 per cent., but Labour wants to talk about tax rises under the previous Conservative Government. We have seen dramatic increases in council tax bills, but the Government choose to ignore the consequences.

It is hardly surprising that the result of all those increases is that wage settlements have increased. The average family must pay nearly £1,000 more a year because of the Government's tax increases, and the only way to fund that is to ask for more money. Meanwhile, the Governor of the Bank of England tells us that the economy is closer to overheating than it has been for a long time. Do the Government pay any attention? No. They prefer to talk about history than take responsibility for dealing with the economy now.

The Governor is not alone. Other members of the Monetary Policy Committee say the same. Soon—probably on 9 July—interest rates will rise once again. The inflation target has been missed 12 times out of 13—a pretty impressive record. Yet the Government prefer to talk about the time before they came to power instead of taking responsibility for their appalling economic choices over the past year. That is why headline inflation is up from 2.4 per cent. last April to 4.2 per cent. today.

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble): I have listened with interest to the hon. Gentleman's arguments, but my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary said that in the Standing Committee on the Finance Bill, the Conservatives supported increases in taxation and expenditure equivalent to £6 billion. That would add £6 billion to the public sector borrowing requirement, and that is what the Conservatives supported. How does that fit in with the Governor of the Bank of England's concern that the economy is overheating? To put £6 billion more into the economy would surely add to overheating, and would add to, rather than reduce, pressure for increased interest rates.

Mr. Woodward: The reality is that running the economy requires prudence. The Chancellor likes to borrow the language of prudence, but shows none. There are areas in which the Finance Bill should be amended, and we shall debate them over the next two days. However, the action that should have been taken by the Chancellor—the United Kingdom's Chancellor, alas—has not been taken. He pretends to be an iron Chancellor, but he is in reality in the vein of old Labour Chancellors. He wants to spend, spend, spend.

The UK faces two futures. In the first, and better, our economy will soon give way to a very hard landing. In the other, more worrying scenario, which we can read about in every newspaper and every forecast, our economy is on course for recession. In either case, there will be a downturn, and that is bad news for Britain. Both scenarios were created in Downing street by the Chancellor's poor choices and bad judgment. He may not want to be here today, but they are his fault, arising from his decisions, for which he must bear responsibility. The Chancellor does nothing but allow the economy to slide into downturn or recession.

Mr. Borrow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Woodward: I shall not. I have given way once to the hon. Gentleman. If he wishes to make a speech, the House will look forward to hearing from him.

The Chancellor wants to wear the clothes of prudence, and wanders round the country telling us how prudent he is. In truth, however, he is about to set off on a huge spending bonanza that every commentator says should not happen. Soon, the Chancellor will preside over public spending of nearly £1 billion a day, and it will be upward from there. Why does he claim prudence? Why not admit to being a giveaway Chancellor? He has been dazzled by his legacy, and by the tax revenues that he has received. In February, he let himself believe, from what his Treasury officials said, that his Budget would balance. In true Labour speak, with the help of the spin doctors, out he went to claim that that was all his doing because of his prudence.

As the Chancellor has claimed to be prudent in the past, he must accept responsibility now for what he has done. Consumer spending has been, and remains, out of control. The march of consumer spending has been closely followed by a battalion of pay rises. If the Chancellor had asked what had really gone wrong with the economy, and what was the real reason why tax revenues were going up, he would have learnt that they were consequences of the market's marching ahead, and had nothing to do with him. The economy is overheating, and it has been for a long time. He has refused to take the right action. He should have reined expenditure in, but he is about to let it go. The economy is overheating, and the Chancellor is in the kitchen stoking up the flames.

Monetary policy can, of course, be used to rein in the economy, but the consequence will be higher interest rates. Tell that to a single person in manufacturing, exports or farming, the people who suffer the consequences of the Government's disastrous interest rate policy. The Chancellor claimed that he would end boom and bust, but he inherited a boom and the evidence suggests that he is taking Britain towards being bust. Our balance of payments plunged into the red for the first three months of this year; after a year and a half of surpluses, the deficit for the first three months of 1998 was £3.2 billion. Is that prudent? Of course not. The trade deficit has widened by £500 million, and our exports are falling. Earnings from Britain's stock of overseas assets have declined by £600 million.

The Government seem complacent. They tell us about history, and will not accept responsibility for their policies of the past 14 months, which are driving Britain headlong towards recession. Industries, businesses and farmers are going bust, but the Government arrogantly deny that anything needs to be done. They pretend that everything is fine. The consumer boom continues, not funded by exports as our recovery was, but because spending is being funded by a massive plundering of savings. To the left of him, to the right of him, in front of him and behind, the Chancellor is surrounded by people who say that the economy is in trouble. Yet he cannot be bothered to come to the House to answer legitimate questions.

The Chief Secretary has shown the same contempt for what we say, but what we say is what others are reporting all over the country. The latest evidence from the OECD warns that rising inflation, tight labour market conditions and upward pressure on earnings will mean a bumpy landing and a "serious challenge". Where is the leadership from the Chief Secretary, which would show that the Government take that challenge seriously, or even that they recognise it? All we hear from Government Back Benchers is what they read on their pagers, readings that tell them that everything is fine.

The hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) talked about businesses in the midlands doing well, but today's Dun and Bradstreet report shows that all is not well. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would do well to learn from the mistakes that were made by the Conservatives when we were in government. It is vital to listen to businesses on their problems, and businesses are screaming with the pain of the Labour Government's policies.

[Mr. Woodward]

The truth is that, as the Financial Times said, Britain is stumbling towards recession. The reality is there to be seen if people are prepared to look, but the Government continue to paint another picture. They talk about getting rid of boom and bust, but they are the ones bringing back the bust to this country. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) said, the spin doctors tell them that if the mantra is rehearsed often enough, people will come to believe it. The problem is that the same people will soon join the unemployed. This month, for the first time in years, the number of unemployment benefit claimants rose. It rose because of this Government's policies. It is the fault of the Chancellor and the Government. If they believe that soundbites are a substitute for policies, this country will come undone.

Mr. Geraint Davies: The number of claimants rose by 1,000 in May, but it went down by 35,000 in the quarter to May. In the first quarter of this year, business investment went up 10 per cent. and the annualised growth rate was 2.9 per cent. against a trend rate of 2 per cent. Things are growing; people are investing. We are in a boom and things are looking good. There is pressure in the labour market because people are getting jobs. That is not a recession but success.

Mr. Woodward: I am grateful for that intervention. As every newspaper points out, under the new way in which the Government wish to calculate the unemployment figures, one could argue that this month was as good as the previous one. Under every other method of calculation, more people are losing jobs than for years. That will not be assisted by the minimum wage, which the Government introduced for perfectly honourable reasons. No one wants people to live in bad conditions. A minimum income yes, but a minimum wage is a guaranteed route, as shown by what has happened elsewhere in the world, to throwing people on to the unemployment scrap heap. That is not the right way forward for a prudent Chancellor. When the Government took power from the Conservative party last year, they inherited falling interest rates,falling unemployment and falling inflation, yet today they are rising. If the hon. Gentleman seriously thinks that the economy can be in a better condition because of those appalling reversals in our economy, he should think again.

What will happen when the impact of the problems in the Asian market starts to hit this country at the end of the year? Presumably the Chancellor will blame someone else, because he believes that it is always someone else's fault. The Chancellor and the Government must learn what the Conservative party learned painfully last year. Ultimately, when they are in No. 10, they are in charge. The Government must recognise that they must take responsibility. It is a reckless Government who continue, as do this Government, not to recognise the signs of economic disaster, yet the Chancellor refuses to face the problems.

Mr. Beard: If there is such havoc in the economy, why do the international markets demonstrate such confidence in the Government and their policies that the pound has risen since the day they took office?

Mr. Woodward: That intervention is extraordinary. The reality is simple. If one continues to push up interest rates in the way that the Government have allowed policy to be prosecuted, the pound will rise. The consequence for manufacturing, farming and the service sector, which is beginning to suffer, is disaster. If the hon. Gentleman went around the country and heard people's worries, he would learn that the so-called encouragement of investment because of high interest rates is not so good for Britain. That is what we are talking about: the right thing to do for Britain.

Only last week, the Financial Times reviewed the Government's policy and said:

"The economy lies stranded in treacherous territory. Every indicator . . . says that the business cycle cannot be wished away."

However, the Government believe that if they practise the mantra of the day, it can be wished away. While the Government continue to believe in spin doctoring as a substitute for policy, Britain moves from a possible to a probable recession.

The Chancellor says that he wants a strong, competitive pound. He has a strong pound, but it is not competitive. Ask anyone in manufacturing or business whether they believe that sterling at its current level is the right thing for Britain and they will say no. The villain of the piece may be sterling, but the father of the villain is the Chancellor. He may wish that long-term policy frameworks could banish short-term problems. An independent Bank might allow him to lay the blame for high interest rates elsewhere today, but tomorrow the country will blame him. The sums show that Britain is teetering on the edge of a serious recession. The party is over.

Mr. Beard: The Conservative party.

Mr. Woodward: It does not behove the hon. Gentleman to say that. It shows ruthless disregard for the evidence. It is not our evidence, but that of every commentator. Labour Back Benchers fail seriously to address what people who have worked in business say. Most Labour Members have pursued honourable professions, but few have worked in or run a business. That lack of experience is beginning to tell in the way that they run the economy.

Tomorrow, Britain will face real problems. Inflation is at its highest level in six years. On 9 July, interest rates may rise again. The Government continue to be complacent. The Chancellor goes elsewhere and pursues his interest in Europe. That is fine, but the problem is that Britain still needs to be run by its national Parliament here. His absence is serious and shows utter contempt for running the economy in a responsible, proper way.

While Rome burns, the senators of this Government are at play, spending here and there and clocking up their new plans for the future. It is totally irresponsible, given the condition of the economy. Ultimately, Britain will pay, and pay heavily. The next rise in interest rates will force all those who have to borrow to pay even more dearly.

Next year, two futures lie ahead. Either the Chancellor will be here telling us about his package of cuts and postponements or he will not be here at all. To save his own skin, the Prime Minister, a man who likes to be characterised as tough on crime, tough on the causes of crime, will find the villain of this crime. The Chancellor may find that he has different responsibilities.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): I am glad to follow a speech so full of bonhomie, wit and joviality. It was interesting to hear an attack on the Government, because attacks have been conspicuous by their absence so far.

I have listened carefully to the debate. The shadow Chancellor, who is not in his place, did not get to grips with what is going on. His main beef seemed to be the absence of the Chancellor. As we are debating a motion in the name of the Leader of the Opposition, perhaps it is important that he is not here. Where is he? That is equally pertinent. What a flagrant abuse of democracy. What contempt for the House of Commons.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: On reflection, the hon. Gentleman may want to apologise for what he has just said—or perhaps he is embarrassing himself by not knowing that the Leader of the Opposition is in hospital.

Mr. Leslie: I did not realise that. Of course I apologise if the right hon. Gentleman is indeed incapacitated, but the deputy leader of the Conservative party has also signed the motion and he is not here either. Lots of people who signed motions today are not here, so it is a little hypocritical to start criticising others for their absence.

This idea of a golden legacy is a wonderful piece of revisionism—the rewriting of history. Some golden legacy it was: interest rates at 15 per cent., inflation at 10 per cent., public sector borrowing and national debt costing, because they doubled in six years, £25 billion in interest payments—[Interruption.] The Tories do not like to hear about that—which is intriguing—but the public know it.

The Conservatives seem not to realise that they lost the election because of their abysmal failure to manage the economy. People looked at their claim to a golden economic legacy and laughed at it.

Mr. Gibb: The hon. Gentleman mentioned revisionism. What did the leader of the Labour party mean when he said, in 1996 during the lead-up to the election, Labour had no plans to raise taxes?

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that the Labour manifesto set out my party's plans and policies on taxation and spending in black and white, whereupon we were elected by an overwhelming majority. We are keeping every single one of our pledges—a concept with which the hon. Gentleman is unfamiliar. That is why his party lost the election: it could not keep its promises, meagre though they were.

It has been interesting to see, in the Standing Committee scrutinising the Finance Bill, the amendments the Conservatives have tabled. As we have heard, they do not deny that they were going to abolish mortgage interest tax relief—earlier, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary hammered that point home. We have also seen in Committee the Tories committing themselves to reducing public sector income by astronomical amounts. Where would they find the savings? From putting up taxes—even income tax? From cutting vital public services? Or from adding to the national debt?

Taken together, Conservative amendments proposed in the Standing Committee amount to a staggering £5.8 billion in reduced spending. With their proposed amendment to the social security bill of £1.5 billion and their commitment to abolish capital gains tax, at a cost of £1.3 billion, they would leave an £8.5 billion black hole in the national finances and wipe out the public sector debt repayment that the Chancellor has proposed for 1999–2000.

Mr. Borrow: Does my hon. Friend agree that if we followed the advice of the Conservative party and increased the public sector borrowing requirement by as much as £8 billion, we would only repeat the mistake made by the Chancellor of 10 years ago—a mistake that led to the boom of the late 1980s and the bust of the early 1990s?

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend is correct. It is clear that the Conservative party has learnt nothing from its defeat as it continues to table profligate amendments to the Finance Bill, espousing reductions in tobacco tax and bingo tax, for instance. The Tories have not as yet proposed any reductions in income tax—it will be interesting to see whether they do. We want to know where all the money will come from.

Mr. Gibb: There is a limit to how much one can stand of this nonsense. It is the Labour Government who have raised taxes although they said before the election that they could fund all their spending programmes by reducing spending on social security. The fact is that they are spending a mammoth amount more on social security, not cutting it. When will the hon. Gentleman apologise for misleading the public during the election about how Labour would fund its spending pledges?

Mr. Leslie: That was a brave attempt by a stalwart member of the Finance Bill Standing Committee to defend ill-thought-out Conservative amendments. He deserves full marks for trying. The hon. Gentleman should know that the Government are reducing the welfare sector's consumption of public money over the lifetime of this Parliament by means of initiatives such as the working families tax credit and welfare to work, which will take people off benefit and into work, thereby reducing social security expenditure. It is that sort of fiscal prudence which will ensure sound long-term public sector finances.

Mr. Woodward: Does the hon. Gentleman think that all the reports being written about Britain heading for a probable recession are wrong?

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman's reading glasses are obviously tinted a certain shade of blue. Not all the reports predict such doom and gloom. The Chancellor has done a remarkable job of striking the right balance between the sort of depression and recession being experienced by Singapore, Indonesia and Korea—in the space of one year their economies have shrunk by between 8 and 20 per cent.—and the enormous rates of growth, perhaps unsustainably high, in America.

Mr. Loughton: Why is a booming economy in America not a problem for inflation there, whereas in this country, uniquely, inflation is rising and has hit 4.2 per cent; indeed, the underlying rate is well above the Chancellor's target? How does the hon. Gentleman explain that dichotomy?

Mr. Leslie: Perhaps it has something to do with the national minimum wage in America. Perhaps we need to look into how the Americans operate it in such a way that their inflation stays low. It proves, at any rate, that it is not impossible to combine a minimum wage and low inflation.

I want to reiterate a point I made earlier about the Liberal Democrats' spending commitments. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) did not deny the Liberals' commitment, made in the Finance Bill Standing Committee, to a policy of, effectively, an extra 8p on income tax. That derives from the £17.5 billion involved in equalising the personal income tax and capital gains tax allowances.

Mr. Edward Davey: The hon. Gentleman pulls his fantasy claims out of the air, but fails to explain his party's policies or what they would cost. For example, the Chancellor is on record as proposing a 10p income tax rate. If that were introduced tomorrow, it would cost billions.

Mr. Leslie: I am sure that any proposals the Chancellor introduces will be fully funded and costed, just like all the other Government proposals so far. The hon. Gentleman said:

"We should consider making the income tax allowance and the CGT allowance the same . . . In the next few weeks and months, my party will put on record the cost of our proposals for an increased income tax allowance."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 16 June 1998; c. 799.]

We await that announcement with bated breath. I look forward to hearing how the Liberal Democrats propose to fund their commitments—it always appears easy for them to spend, spend, spend in a way that the Conservative party is learning to do, but they never say where the money will come from and that is what we need to hear. A bit more responsibility from Opposition Members would not go amiss.

On fiscal policy, it is important to highlight the way in which the Government have been working towards reducing the national debt and the public sector borrowing requirement, so ensuring that that burden around the necks of taxpayers is reduced. The hon. Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir P. Tapsell) claims to be a Keynesian; I wonder what Keynes would have to say about the astronomic levels of national debt created by the Conservative Government. I was interested to hear Opposition Members' rather contradictory arguments on that point.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Keynes was in favour of deficit financing during a recession.

Mr. Leslie: And, boy, we certainly had recessions—not just one, but two. We are glad that the hon. Gentleman has reminded us of that.

I also want to highlight the way in which the Government have chosen to prioritise capital and infrastructure investment. That announcement, made in the past few weeks, has not yet been fully appreciated: the state—the great oil tanker—has begun to be turned around. Year on year, taxpayers' money was consumed at the expense of investment in capital infrastructure in schools, hospitals and transport networks.

Capital infrastructure helps to improve the quality of the economy and helps business by ensuring that we have long-term infrastructure available throughout the economy to support the industrial capacity we need for future generations. The Government's well-placed policies to give tax breaks through the working families tax credit and the lowest ever corporation tax rate are also welcome; and the acclaim with which many in the business community have greeted the Government's policies has been alluded to.

In monetary policy, the Government have struck the right balance by depoliticising interest rates and passing decisions to the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank of England.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): Before the hon. Gentleman reaches the end of his list, will he explain why, under the Chancellor's economic stewardship, the savings ratio has fallen from 12.7 per cent. in the second quarter of 1997 to 9.1 per cent. in the first quarter of this year?

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman was not listening to me—it might be useful if he made his own speech. My point in respect of monetary policy relates to the depoliticisation of interest rate decisions and their removal from the scope of political intervention of the sort seen under the Conservatives. In the run-up to the election, they took great risks with the economy at the expense of long-term investment in their attempt to front-load the economy and make it appear as sweet as possible to the electorate. They failed abysmally and, as a consequence, the new Labour Government had to clear up the mess they left.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Does my hon. Friend agree that the reduction in the savings rate is a symptom of a buoyancy and confidence in the economy which, as the motion tells us, we last saw in 1990, during the boom years of the Lawson era? It is a symptom of confidence and it is not necessarily linked with tax changes, as has been spuriously argued.

Mr. Leslie: That is right. Commentators have talked about consumer confidence.

Mr. Loughton: Given the hon. Gentleman's comments about how right it is that the House is no longer in charge of setting interest rates, will he applaud the Bank of England if, on 9 July, it puts up interest rates for the seventh time, with the result that mortgage rates rise for many of his constituents and mine?

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman falls into the trap of the previous Government. Politicians have always tried to make decisions about technical and important economic indices, but I prefer to leave such matters to the intelligent and informed views of the members of the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank of England, who are in a far better position to take such decisions than I am as a politician.

The hon. Gentleman likes to think of himself as an expert on such matters—I am sure that his ambition is to be Chancellor one day. He has been impressive as a member of the Finance Bill Standing Committee, making many long and intricate speeches—and he certainly has the braces for the role. I am sure that the country prefers experts to make decisions on such important matters, and the Chancellor's depoliticisation of monetary policy has been widely acclaimed. However, it is not wholly outside the realm of the Government to influence monetary policy; it is important that we deal with inflation and try to achieve targets when and where we can.

Something that has disappointed me most as Member of Parliament for a Yorkshire constituency is the ridiculous boardroom excesses of companies such as Yorkshire Water. This week, the board of directors of Yorkshire Water awarded themselves a 30 per cent. pay rise. Kevin Bond, the chief executive, has, in one year, awarded himself a 69 per cent. increase in salary, taking it to £298,000. The salaries of the board of directors now total almost £1 million, with increases of 69 per cent. at the helm and 30 per cent. as a whole—but what are they going to say to Yorkshire Water's employees when they come seeking pay increases for the new year? Are the directors going to tell the employees that they are not important? Are they going to give them 30 or 69 per cent. pay increases? It will be interesting to see what they do. It is vital that company directors across the country act responsibly, recognise that they must set an example and show pay restraint.

Mr. Woodward: As the hon. Gentleman has such high moral views on the subject, will he comment on the remarks made earlier today by my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude)? Having castigated those involved in the water industry, what is his response to Mr. Gavyn Davies's reaping a £16 million benefit from changes that the Labour Government have made to capital gains tax? Does the hon. Gentleman applaud Mr. Davies for doing that, or does he think that he should hand the money back, as he would have those working in the water industry do?

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman lists in the Register of Members' Interests a shareholding in Sainsbury and, although he might no longer do so, the shadow Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude), has declared a directorship in Asda. I should be interested to know what were the pay awards to the directors of those companies. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] Perhaps the shadow Chancellor will tell us what pay was awarded to him as a director of Asda—

Mr. Woodward: The hon. Gentleman cannot answer my question.

Mr. Leslie: It would be interesting to discover whether the award was within the inflation target or above it. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. We should not have all this noise.

Mr. Leslie: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is important that company directors set an example by showing restraint. The same applies to all people in a position of responsibility.

Throughout today's debate, we have watched an Opposition who have not got their act together. They attack the Government for not spending enough in some respects, but say that we spend, spend, spend in others. It is difficult to know whom we should believe. We have had an interesting look at the history of the Conservative party in office, and the House has been reminded of the exchange rate mechanism debacle. That has been very instructive in reminding us of the mess that the Conservative party created. It is clear that the legacy that it calls golden is an outrageous, appalling mess, and it is left to us to help to clear up the problem and put the economy on a sound footing, ensuring that we focus on the long-term interests of the people and businesses of the country.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): In this debate, Government Members, particularly the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, have talked about every period of economic history except the past year. They were willing to debate every policy except their own. It seems that, after only a year, Labour Members are already terrified about talking about what the new Government have done. We can understand their embarrassment, but it does not excuse the failure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to answer the debate or at least be present to answer for his policies.

We understand the Chancellor's discomfort, because he has created two economies in this country. We heard in the debate about the boom economy affecting the City, the service sector and consumer expenditure, but there is another economy for manufacturing and exporting, which is going into recession. That ought to worry Government Members. Instead of making platitudinous remarks about how everything is wonderful in their constituencies, they should start to take note of the letters that we know they are receiving from businesses in their constituencies which tell a different story.

We know that Labour Members are receiving those letters because businesses have begun to copy them to Conservative Members on the Standing Committee on the Finance Bill. My hon. Friends will confirm that we are receiving letters from businesses exasperated by the failure of Labour members of the Committee to speak up about the gathering recession in their constituencies.

Mr. Woodward: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it was extraordinary during the Committee stage of the Finance Bill that Government Back Benchers had letters from their constituents that were copied to Conservative Members, but they consistently failed even once to speak on behalf of their constituents and simply allowed themselves to be railroaded by the Government Whips?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend was a member of that Committee, and he knows that the Forum of Private Business copied to us letters written by businesses represented by Labour Members, who were entirely silent about the difficulties that those businesses faced as a result of tax increases. It was up to us, as it always will be, to defend the interests of working Britain.

The reason for that distortion and the two economies that the Government have created is that this country has not one economic policy, but two. Indeed, one could almost say that we have two Chancellors, or a single Chancellor in two disguises. One Chancellor is panicked by the broken promises on waiting lists and class sizes into reverting to the tax and spend policies that Labour Chancellors always follow.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will complete this point.

The other Chancellor is a stern monetarist. He is in favour of higher interest rates, a tightening of monetary policy and suppression of wage rises. However, that policy is not working, for the reasons so well outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir P. Tapsell) in a notable speech. He showed that one cannot have a sensible economic policy that pulls in two directions. There is a mismatch between monetary and fiscal policy, which we pointed out last year and which is causing damage.

The mistakes were first made almost exactly a year ago in the Government's first Budget, in which they broke all their promises on tax, as has been amply demonstrated. The average family are now enduring an extra burden on their budget of £981 a year because of the tax and mortgage increases that they have suffered. However, not only have there been 17 tax increases, but the Chancellor deliberately took the opportunity to target savings. He carried out a £5 billion a year raid on pension funds, which is exactly what the economy did not need. The economic damage will be with us for many years.

Mr. Beard: The right hon. Gentleman made the charge, which has so often been repeated, that the abolition of advance corporation tax was a hit on pension funds. The aim was to give an incentive for profits to be put into investment and research and development rather than distributed, so that the economy would be put on a proper foundation. Nothing could demonstrate more the difference in economic policy between Conservative and Labour Members. We are concerned about the real economy, and Conservative Members' sole concern is manipulating money.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Gentleman makes that remark from the comfort of a protected parliamentary pension scheme. That sophistry does not go down well with the millions of pensioners and contributors to pension funds, all of whom know perfectly well that there was a £5 billion a year hit on their savings by a Government whose rhetoric was all about the need to build up long-term savings and increase personal self-reliance. They will never again trust the Government on savings. My economic point is that that is exactly what the economy needed least.

One does not need to be an economist to know that if one taxes savings, there will be less savings. The Government figures support that. I hope that the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard) will at least heed the Chancellor's Budget statement. Page 91 clearly shows that the savings ratio is due to fall this year, next year and even further the following year. Instead of building up savings, the Chancellor is predicting that there will be a further drop in savings. He has made that worse with his botched attack on TESSAs and PEPs—the most successful savings vehicles of all time—which the Government are simply abolishing.

The Bank of England is now left with the job of salvaging something from the anti-inflation strategy. Its only response can be to put up interest rates, which it has had to do again and again. There have been six rises since the general election. The Bank is now required by statute law to give overriding priority to the Government's inflation target, which is being missed month after month. Policy will not work as long as there is a mismatch between the tax and spend policies of the Treasury and the monetary policy enforced by the Bank of England.

That tale of two economic policies gets worse.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will not give way, because I am conscious of the time.

A new chapter has been opened in that tale of mismatch. Two weeks ago, the Chancellor announced a dramatic further loosening of expenditure policy. Expenditure is now due to rise by at least 2.75 per cent. above inflation each and every year. The rise is greater if all the fiddles and changed definitions are added in—a point which my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Woodward) made well in his speech.

What is particularly shocking is that the Bank of England, which is supposed to be in charge of counter-inflation policy, was not even told of that development. The Governor said rather lamely that he had been informed by the Treasury that nothing in the Chancellor's statement would affect the economy for two years. That is untrue—the Governor was misled. The brakes come off expenditure from 1 April next year. Either the Treasury representative on the Monetary Policy Committee was kept in the dark or he failed to inform the Bank of England about what the Chancellor had in mind.

Frankly, there is already enough confusion about interest rates, without this further failure to co-ordinate monetary and fiscal policy. We already know that, at its May meeting, the MPC voted 7:1 against raising interest rates, but in June it raised interest rates. Now, the Governor of the Bank of England has signalled a further increase. The Bank of England is not to blame. It has been given an impossible task—trying to make sense of the Government's economic policy, which is muddled and contradictory.

There have been two economic policies, one pursued by the Treasury and the other by the Bank. That has created two economies, one in boom and the other in bust. The Government's achievement is that they have done both at the same time. That is why the inflation target is being missed month after month. The Chancellor's only response is to blame firms for paying workers too much—and that from a Government who are trying to intervene in the labour market to get those same firms to pay other workers more.

In the non-boom parts of the economy, it is an entirely different story, as I am sure Labour Members truly know. Unemployment is rising, and there is a yawning and growing balance of payments deficit. Bankruptcies are up 10 per cent. in this quarter over the last quarter, and investment is down. Again, Labour Members only have to read their Chancellor's statements on investment. We have heard a great deal about the need for investment, but I refer hon. Members to page 94 of the Red Book, which shows that investment in the whole economy is falling this year compared to last, is due to fall again next year and is due to fall even further in the year after. With business investment, the fall is even steeper.

If Labour Members do not believe the Treasury's statistics, I refer them to Goldman Sachs, which said in its recent circular that "the rise in net capital spending to 1.4 per cent. of GDP by the year 2001/02 is less than the average of 1.6 per cent. of GDP achieved during the last Parliament."

After all the huffing and puffing, future investment will be less than we achieved in the last Parliament.

It is not just the economy today that is going wrong; the Government are storing up problems for the rest of this Parliament. I believe that, in their hearts, Labour Members believe that. That is why, in the debate, they have talked about everything except the past year. Apart from the feeble attempts to justify their record in their constituencies, their bleepers have quite clearly told them, "Keep off the economy."

I am sure that both sides of the House know—certainly the country does—that the Government inherited the strongest economy in Europe, with steady growth, stable inflation and falling unemployment, all confirmed by the statistics. It took considerable determination by the Chancellor to mess up that legacy, but he has done it in less than a year. He has done it through a series of policy mistakes, all of them preventable and all of them pointed out to him at the time. All our warnings have turned out to be true.

Hon. Members who served on the Finance Bill Committee will remember one particular moment when it was shown, again by their constituents, that the abolition of retirement relief and its replacement by a highly complex and probably unworkable system of tapering capital gains tax was highly regressive. It is all very well if one is a partner in Goldman Sachs and enriched by, it is estimated, £16 million simply by one clause in the Finance Bill—but it is not quite so rosy for small entrepreneurs planning for retirement, especially as they would have had to pay no capital gains tax under the Conservative Government's provisions.

The reality is always different from the rhetoric. The reality is that the Finance Bill that we will be discussing tomorrow and the next day is in practice highly regressive. It was an interesting glimpse of new Labour priorities that the Government make the rich very rich and the smaller entrepreneurs—

Mr. Leslie: No, we did not.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Yes, the Government did. The hon. Gentleman voted for this regressive provision and he will be getting letters from small businesses in his constituency. If he wants anything done about them, all he has to do is pass them over to us.

The golden economic legacy has turned into a boom-bust economic derailment. It is not surprising that the Chancellor has chosen to address a committee of the European Parliament rather than defend his policies in this House. That is a disgraceful affront to the privileges and rights of the House—but, in his absence, we judge him and, in our motion, we condemn him. I invite the House to vote for that motion.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Helen Liddell): I deeply regret that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is not present this afternoon, because he could not possibly believe just how bad the Opposition have been. The debate had made being savaged by a dead sheep seem like a stimulating experience.

The right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) began his attack on the Government's economic policy by saying that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was addressing a committee of the European Parliament. As my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary pointed out, there is a Pavlovian response from Conservative Members at the mere mention of the word "Europe". What galls them even more is that, after 14 months in government, Britain at last has a respectable position in Europe. The Government are acknowledged by the British people to be carrying out their responsibilities in Europe. It is a measure of the extent to which this country was undermined by the previous Government that we had a beef ban.

The Opposition are thoroughly ashamed of their record; otherwise, why would they be so frightened of our going back over their record of 18 years in government? I can tell hon. Members who are new to the House that, in 1997, the previous Government were very fond of casting minds back to 1979. Is it not interesting that they were prepared to count back 18 years, but object to our counting back 18 months. We have to live with the consequences of their economic incompetence, which was so graphically exposed by my hon. Friends earlier.

Mr. Tyrie rose—

Mrs. Liddell: I will come to the hon. Gentleman later. After all, he is giving seminars to his Front Bench on whether the public finances are sound.

It is no wonder that hon. Gentlemen and hon. Ladies—in fact, no hon. Ladies took part in the debate; perhaps they have too much good sense in these matters—are ashamed of the previous Government's record. We have only to look at their performance: whole economy investment fell by 16 per cent. from its 1989 peak to its 1993 trough; business investment fell by 20 per cent. from 1989 to 1993; manufacturing investment fell by 27.7 per cent.; labour force survey unemployment rose by almost 1 million, but they laughed at rising unemployment—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. We cannot have conversations all over the Chamber. The hon. Lady should be heard.

Mrs. Liddell: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am not surprised that Conservative Members do not want to hear about their record in government. It was a shameful record. Indeed, it is clear from some of the performances that they have learnt nothing from the arrogance of their years in government. They should have come to the House tonight and apologised for the state in which they left the economy. They talk about the golden legacy, but it is fool's gold. We are now having to deal with an economy that has inherent structural problems caused by the incompetence of the previous Government.

Talk of a golden legacy is nonsense. Thanks to the boom-bust policies of the Conservative party—policies which have damaged growth, held back investment and cost jobs—in the past 20 years we have had the two deepest recessions, and one of the largest booms, since the war. We must set the economy to rights, because it affects ordinary people.

Let us consider some of the structural problems that have been caused by the performance of the Conservative party. Productive investment has fallen. We badly need to boost productivity in our economy, for the simple reason that, from day one of the Conservative Government in 1979, government was characterised by short-termism and a lack of attention to the fundamentals of the economy.

Mr. Tyrie: By how much did the British economy grow under the last Labour Government, and by how much did the British economy grow, on average, during the 18 years of Conservative rule?

Mrs. Liddell: I thought that we were not supposed to look back. The last Labour Government was 18 years ago, and we are now setting right the errors of the Conservative Government. [Interruption.] As Conservative Members want me to talk about the Labour Government's performance, I am happy to do so. Gross domestic product growth in the first quarter of 1998—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not expect anyone to shout at the hon. Lady while she is speaking.

Mrs. Liddell: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Shouting is usually the way in which Conservative Members try to get through these arguments; they want to introduce irrelevancies because they do not want to talk about facts.

Mr. Maude: If productivity and investment are so important, why do Government figures show that productivity, which was rising, is now falling, and why does the Red Book show business investment falling consistently in future years?

Mrs. Liddell: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman should have another seminar from his hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) about the impact on productivity of the previous Government's performance. There is a fundamental requirement to make basic structural changes in the economy. Structural changes are about improving education and skills, and about putting back to work people whom the previous Government abandoned on the dole queue. From their patrician standpoint, the Conservatives do not care about the ordinary people who were thrown on the scrap-heap by their policies. Labour Members lived daily with the consequences of their economic performance.

Less than two years into a Labour Government, GDP growth in the first quarter of 1998 was 3 per cent. higher than a year earlier. Whole-economy investment in the first quarter of 1998 was up 8.6 per cent. on a year earlier. Over the same period, business investment was up 10 per cent. In March, employment was up 429,000 on a year earlier. The International Labour Organisation figure for unemployment in April was 264,000 lower than a year earlier.

Conservative Members do not like those facts; they have gone quiet because they cannot deny the impact that we have had on the economy. With our long-term policies, we shall restructure the economic policies and economic performance of the country. We want to do that partly because we want to ensure that the people of the country enjoy a much better life style.

There was an interesting vignette as the Chief Secretary was talking about the national health service. This is a week of extreme importance to Labour Members, as we mark the 50th anniversary of the national health service. Fifty years ago, the Conservative party opposed that national health service. During earlier exchanges, my right hon. Friend pointed out that the shadow Chancellor had said that the national health service—and the welfare state—was responsible for a downturn in private provision of medical services. Yes, it was—and thank goodness, because, where I come from, before there was a national health service, young and old people died. Day in, day out, we lived with the consequences of the objections that the Conservative party has to public funding of the health service.

In 1998, the Government are proud of the national health service, and our policies are designed to ensure that we will maintain—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already appealed to the House to come to order.

Mrs. Liddell: That noise was a measure of the contempt that Conservative Members have for the national health service and for ordinary people.

I shall discuss some of the arguments that have been made.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): Will the Minister give way?

Mrs. Liddell: No; I want to make progress.

The shadow Chancellor failed to take into account his hon. Friends' performance in the Committee of the Finance Bill. They utterly failed to acknowledge the responsibilities of a responsible Opposition. Conservative Members, who cannot even decide whether they support higher public expenditure, would have spent £6 billion more than the Government.

In the seminar provided for the shadow Chancellor, he could not make up his mind whether the country's finances were in a good position. He has yet to respond to the challenge that the Chief Secretary made to him about MIRAS. As Financial Secretary to the Treasury, the right hon. Gentleman condemned mortgage interest rate relief. He repeatedly refuses to address the key issues for the people of this country.

I am grateful for some of the things that the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) said in recognition of Government economic policy, but we differ on some points. Listening to his colleagues' performance, in the Committee on the Finance Bill and elsewhere, one would conclude that they want £17 billion of additional expenditure. They know how to spend, but not how to tax. The hon. Gentleman asks us for fiscal tightening when the Government are tightening the economy by 2.75 per cent. and yet, whenever we introduce a measure requiring fiscal tightening, the hon. Gentleman's colleagues vote against it. He must decide which side he is on.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: On many occasions we have supported—as did the Conservative party—fiscal tightening, especially on anti-avoidance measures.

Mrs. Liddell: What about all the other measures? The hon. Gentleman wants reports to Parliament; he wants to delay implementation of measures that the Government have introduced for fiscal tightening.

If we study Conservative Members' performance during the passage of the Finance Bill, we see an Opposition who do not even know how to oppose. As a Government, they did not know how to govern; as an Opposition, they do not know how to oppose. They are as useless as an Opposition as they were as a Government.

Mr. Paterson: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs. Liddell: No; I will not. In the debate, there were a number of—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman has not even been in the Chamber all day. At one point, there were only five Opposition Members in the Chamber, two of whom were from the other Opposition parties. Indeed, I began to think that something might be going on elsewhere in the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Ms Southworth) made sound points about Conservative Members' performance. She made the telling point that 1,000 homes a week were being repossessed as a consequence of Conservative policies.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale): The hon. Lady should not criticise the Conservatives, as the current Government are in danger of emulating them. In the past year, in Scotland, house repossessions have increased by 16 per cent., and half of that increase took place in the last quarter.

Mrs. Liddell: That is the representative of the party whose Treasury spokesman, on Friday, defined its economic policy as hoping for the best—the fingers crossed school of economics. The only growth industry in an independent Scotland would be the selling of lucky white heather. That is the economics of the Scottish National party.

In a speech that reminded us of the great divisions in the Conservative party, the hon. Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir P. Tapsell) spoke about the effect of the establishment of the Monetary Policy Committee on long-term interest rates. In April 1997, long-term interest rates were 7.6 per cent; today, they are 5.87 per cent. For someone who has been an hon. Member for 40 years, he should be well aware that that is a very good indicator of the future of British business.

The hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Woodward) complained about the Government's "spending bonanza". Perhaps he would care to have a conversation with the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), who said that "spending under this Government is less than it would have been had the Conservative party stayed in office."—[Official Report, 16 June 1998; Vol. 314, c. 183.]

Conservative Members cannot even make up their minds on the nature of their attack on the Government. I therefore commend to the House outright opposition to the ludicrous motion tabled by Conservative Members, who have not even deigned to provide this debate with some rational argument.

The policies that the Government are pursuing to ensure long-term economic stability will set right the structural problems that have been created by the economic illiteracy and incompetence of the previous Government. It is no surprise that they are so horrified at the prospect of our alluding to their record in Government.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House notes that the Government inherited an economy in which the current Budget was in deficit by £21 billion, inflation was set to rise because of the failure of the previous Government to take the necessary action on interest rates and nearly one in five households of working age had nobody working; recalls that the previous Government presided over a boom and bust economy with interest rates peaking at 15 per cent. and the two worst recessions since the war, doubled the national debt in the 1990s, doubled unemployment during its time in office, worsened inequality and failed to tackle the weaknesses in the British economy; commends the actions of the Government in its first year, which has established a credible framework for monetary policy that has led to the lowest long-term interest rates in 33 years, set two clear fiscal rules which provide for both prudent public finance and strong public services in the years ahead, taken action to reduce government borrowing such that the current Budget was in surplus by £1 billion in 1997–98, supported British business through cuts in corporation tax and small business tax to their lowest levels ever, launched the New Deal, the biggest employment programme for decades, reformed the tax and benefit system to tackle the unemployment and poverty traps and invested in education and skills; and notes that Britain now has a government which will ensure that the country does not return to the boom and bust and 15 per cent. interest rates of the late 1980s and early 1990s and instead has an economic policy based on stability, enterprise, employment and fairness.

Class Sizes

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): I must point out that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): I beg to move,

That this House notes that primary class sizes have increased since the Government came to power, and that almost half a million pupils at Key Stage 1 are now in classes of 31 or more; condemns the Government's failure to deliver its early pledge to reduce infant class sizes; believes that while reducing class sizes is a desirable objective, this should not be done at the expense of parental choice or by creating more mixed-age classes; and condemns the Government's inability to implement its pledge in a way consistent with raising educational standards.

We have tabled this motion because we are still waiting for the Government's first annual report on how they have performed since they were elected on 1 May 1997. In particular, we are still waiting to hear from Ministers an account of how they have performed in respect of their five early pledges, which not only appeared on the credit cards that were distributed to the electorate, but were even stamped on coffee mugs distributed at the Labour party conference. One of those pledges was on class sizes. If the annual report were being produced by a company, that company would soon be in breach of its statutory obligations—the report is so delayed that the company would soon find itself hauled before the courts.

We hope to see the Government's report soon, and we hope that it will explain why, despite the pledge to reduce class sizes, the number of children studying key stage 1 in classes of more than 30 has gone up since the election and why the number of children in primary schools in classes of more than 30 has gone up since the election. That is exactly the opposite of the pledge on which the Government were elected.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I am grateful to the Minister for giving way—I mean the shadow Minister. Does he accept that local authorities have not been very co-operative, especially Conservative-controlled Cambridgeshire which was allocated an extra £9.5 million by the Government to spend on education but failed to do so? Indeed, £1.6 million of it was allocated to other services. [Interruption.] I am sure that the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), who is sitting immediately behind the hon. Gentleman, will confirm what I have said.

Mr. Willetts: My hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) was saying that Cambridgeshire was spending above its standard spending assessment. I do not have my hon. Friend's expertise on Cambridgeshire, but had the hon. Lady been at the annual conference of local education authorities last week, as I was, she would have heard LEA members of a variety of political persuasions agree on one thing—that it was not practical to deliver the Government's pledge on class sizes, something to which I shall return in a moment.

[Mr. Willetts]

The Government's record compares unfavourably with our record. When we left office, a smaller proportion of pupils was taught in classes of more than 30 than when we came to office in 1979.

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): Rubbish.

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Lady shouts "Rubbish", but I assure her that these are figures from the House of Commons Library.

Ministers' response to the embarrassing predicament of twice having to announce increases in class sizes was to say that they were going to bring forward the delivery of their pledge. Previously, the plan had been that it should be delivered by 2002. As evidence of how serious the Government were about delivering it, they said that it would be delivered in 2001. However, when the electorate were voting for an early pledge, they did not believe that "early" meant 2002. People do not seriously believe that delivering it in 2001 means delivering it earlier than they had been led to expect by the Government.

For Ministers now to say that there is no prospect of delivering their pledge until 2001 is a failure to deliver on the expectations that they were happy to excite among the electorate in order to get themselves elected. Their interpretation of "early"—namely, that they made the pledge early on, not that it will be delivered early on—is not an interpretation that one single member of the electorate ever understood.

What are the Government going to do about delivering their pledge? The Department for Education and Employment will have to make every effort to ensure that the Government can retrieve the position after the embarrassment of their first 15 months in office. What will their efforts to deliver this pledge mean in practice?

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): In Norfolk, it will mean that 1,000 pupils who would have been in classes of more than 30 will not be. Could we have a better debate than we had this afternoon—a debate on the facts? Does the hon. Gentleman not recognise that that very pledge card said how the pledge would be delivered and that the Bill to abolish the assisted places scheme—the Education (Schools) Bill—was among the first Bills that this Government introduced? It is obvious that, until we have delivered on that, we cannot spend the money.

Mr. Willetts: All I can say to the hon. Gentleman is that—I have the copy of the relevant page of the Labour manifesto here—it was described as an early pledge, and I do not regard delivery in 2001 or 2002 as an early pledge. It was also described as being financed by using money saved from the assisted places scheme. We have already seen the new deal money for capital expenditure raided because it was clear that the assisted places scheme was not going to be able to raise enough money to deliver the pledge, so it does not seem that the Government are in any way sticking to the assurances that they gave before the election.

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers) rose—

Mr. Willetts: I will give way to the Minister, and then I shall try to make some progress.

Mr. Byers: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way because, like my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner), I hope that the debate can be based on facts. Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that not a single penny of the new deal capital money has been used for the reduction of class sizes? Additional resources, provided by the Chancellor in the Budget of March this year—an extra £40 million—were made available, but that is over and above the new deal money that was announced in July last year. Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that that is the case?

Mr. Willetts: This is, admittedly, a murky area, but what we seem to have is, first, money from the abolition of the assisted places scheme not being sufficient to finance the delivery of this pledge, for the simple reason that the pupils who would otherwise have participated in the assisted places scheme still need to have an education. They do not disappear off the face of the earth, which seemed to be the basis on which the Labour Government were working. Secondly, we have had some new deal money from the capital allocation and, thirdly—I am happy to concur with what the Minister has just said—the Chancellor has found extra money on top of the assisted places money and on top of the new deal; that is further money which was announced in the Budget. The Government are unable, on the Minister's own words, to deliver the pledge by using simply assisted places scheme money.

Mr. Byers: On the facts—and the record will show that the hon. Gentleman said that the new deal money had been raided to fund the reduction of class sizes—will he confirm that that is not the case, but that a further £40 million has been made available over and above the new deal money to support the reduction in class sizes? Therefore, there has been no raid on new deal money.

Mr. Willetts: We are getting bogged down here. Of course the Minister is correct to say that there was a further £40 million in the Budget, but it was on top of the money from the abolition of the assisted places scheme. It was made clear that one of the purposes that the Government wanted the capital expenditure under the new deal for schools to go on was reducing class sizes, so the Minister is having to raid three pots, rather than financing the policy simply out of the assisted places scheme. That seems to be the position.

What we are now going to see is the slow and painful process of a shift from what seemed to do well in the focus groups. I am sure that there are parents throughout the country who want their children to be educated in smaller classes; of course we understand that that is what parents want. It became a pledge, but now it is in the process of becoming a law, and soon it will be unlawful to carry out active education in a class of more than 30.

At that point, the problems will begin. Something that is, indeed, desirable as one of the many ways in which to raise educational standards will instead become the be-all and end-all of education policy. Parents throughout the country who would have liked the idea of their children being educated in smaller classes will find themselves paying a very high price for a rigid, obsessional commitment to delivering that objective, to the exclusion of all the other things that can deliver high-quality education for our children.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): My son is educated in a class with more than 30 pupils and I have no complaint about that; he receives a perfectly adequate and proper education. My fear is that, once requirements are laid on the school to provide for smaller classes, that will make it a target—a marginal school, in the eyes of the education authority—for closure.

Mr. Willetts: That is a good point, which I hope to turn to later in my speech.

One of the reasons why we wanted this debate is that there is widespread concern among teachers, people in local education authorities and parents about the implications of this policy for parental choice. The Minister regularly asserts simply that he can implement this policy with no reduction in parental choice, but assertion will not do. He has to provide the evidence to explain how it is possible to implement this policy without any reduction in parental choice. There are popular schools that have been accepting children, even though it will take their class sizes above 30. It is impossible to implement the Government's pledge without parents, whose children could have been educated by teachers who believed that they could deliver high-quality education in schools that were getting high-quality Office for Standards in Education reports, not being able to get their children to those schools.

I have studied the documents that the Government have sent to local education authorities on this; the outline regulations are out for consultation. The Minister, or his officials, asked for much information from LEAs. They say that the information to be provided must include:

"Details of how plans are consistent with the enhancement of parental preference".

They also ask for the "arrangements LEA is making for circumstances where there is no suitable school within reasonable distance".

They expect LEAs to answer an impossible question. How can LEAs develop plans that will always be consistent with the enhancement of parental preference, where there is no suitable school within reasonable distance of a popular school that is over-subscribed and has been taking classes of more than 30? What the Minister is doing is asking LEAs to deliver a variety of inconsistent objectives.

Last week, the Minister spoke at the conference of the Council of Local Education Authorities in Derbyshire; I was there myself. After he had given his now standard performance, when he says, "I can absolutely assert that there will be no reduction in parental preference," the LEA conference promptly passed a motion that "constraints on parental preference" are essential to reducing class sizes, so it did not find him very persuasive. The chairman of a Labour-controlled education authority—Lewisham—said:

"You shouldn't make pledges if you aren't in a position to carry them out. The Government has made two pledge, on class sizes and parental choice. It is in danger of failing to deliver on either".

The Minister failed to persuade his own allies in local government that he could credibly assure them that there would be no reduction in parental choice, and we all know why. There are popular schools that are taking children in classes of more than 30 and where there is no practical scope for building new classrooms. It may not be physically possible. They are going to have to turn away parents, when they would have been happy to educate their children.

However, it is not just a matter of the constraints on parental choice. What will happen about mixed-age classes? The most serious work that we have had on the implications of the Government's policies has come not from the Department—all that we have had from the Department and the Minister have been assertions and questions—but from Coopers and Lybrand, for the Local Government Association. It says:

"In our view the policy of reducing class sizes is likely to result in a rise in the incidence of pupils in mixed age classes in primary schools".

That is not a Conservative spokesman speaking. That comes from the most expert review of the subject, carried out for the Local Government Association.

Just at the time that the Government are going to force more pupils into mixed-age classes, their commitment to literacy and numeracy has been described by Ofsted as requiring that there be fewer mixed-age classes, and that children be taught with children of as close an age to them as possible, and at a similar stage of development. Therefore, the Government are not going to be able to deliver their pledge without making it more difficult for teachers to deliver their literacy and numeracy targets.

Ministers sometimes say that at least the parents who get their children into classes of under 30 will gain, but they are unwilling to say what will happen to the number of teaching assistants. They do not appear to realise that schools are funded largely on a per capita basis. Telling a school that has been educating children in classes of 35 that it can have classes no bigger than 30 will result not just in five unhappy parents losing the school of their choice, but in the school having a smaller budget. Teaching assistants will be laid off, resulting in fewer of them supporting teachers. How does the Minister plan to avoid that?

There will also be heavy-handed intervention in the affairs of schools throughout the country. The Minister has talked about a light touch on the management of schools, but instead there will be remorseless pressure from the centre—another expression that Ministers have used from time to time. As the local education authority report said:

"Essentially they"—

"are handing back to the LEA the management and organisation of Key Stage 1."

To answer the intrusive and heavy-handed questions and deliver the requirements that Ministers have placed on them, LEAs will have to return to an old-style, command-and-control relationship with their schools, when one of the most healthy developments in British education in the past 20 years was a more sensible relationship between LEAs and their schools. The implementation of the policy will push that back.

There are many other questions that Ministers have to answer. Many of my hon. Friends are keen to ask those questions, so I shall not pursue detailed issues about, for example, children with special educational needs. For some extraordinary reason, the only serious exception to the pledge is that classes can be larger than 30 if they include children with special educational needs. Most of us would have thought that smaller classes were particularly necessary in such circumstances. I shall not ask about the distributional impact of the pledge, but it looks as though it will have the extraordinary result of shifting resources to more affluent areas, where larger classes are concentrated. Labour Members do not appear to understand that there is nothing in the policy for inner-city schools. It will give more money to Bromley; it has nothing for Tower Hamlets.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North): How can the hon. Gentleman maintain that argument when, from September, 800 children in Warrington—which definitely does not consist of leafy suburbs—will benefit from smaller class sizes?

Mr. Willetts: The Coopers and Lybrand report clearly states that the policy will shift resources to more affluent areas. I am surprised that Labour Members have not considered the implications of their policy. If they had thought for a moment about where popular schools and larger classes were, the implications would have been obvious.

I saw an interesting story on the front page of The Daily Telegraph today, which may have had something to do with the Minister's preparations for this debate. It announced that there would be capital funding for 100 Church schools to deliver the class size pledge. There are 3,557 Church schools taking children in infant classes. An estimated 46 per cent. of those have infants in classes of more than 30. That is a rough estimate and if the Minister can improve on it, I should be happy to be corrected. Based on that estimate, there are 1,600 such Church schools. If he believes that his announcement of special assistance for 100 of them will go any way towards dealing with the widespread anxieties in denominational schools throughout the country about how they will be affected by the pledge, he has another think coming.

There are not many aided schools in my constituency. St. Alban's is a popular and well respected Church of England primary school, which has taken 35 children in each year hitherto. It has good Ofsted reports and the parents in Havant who want their infants to have a denominational education have only that school to opt for. The head teacher wrote to me, saying:

"This will mean that five children who would have been admitted to this school in the past will not be offered places, although they have chosen a Church of England school, and will probably have a church reference to back up their application. I am aware that there are schools in the area who will be able to admit these children"— those are the surplus places that the Minister is so keen to get rid of—

"but parental choice will be limited."

At the moment, those classes have one teacher and two teaching assistants. When I visited the school, I met some very despondent and confused teaching assistants, because one teaching assistant in each class would have to be sacked because of the reduction in the per capita funding to the school. That will be the reality on the ground when what began as an attractive pledge goes into law as a rigid commitment to be implemented whatever the practical implications for schools.

Since the Government launched the policy, we have heard no more than assertions that the problems that are widely feared in the educational world will not occur. We hope to hear more than assertions and talk about money tonight. We want to hear a practical example of what will happen to a popular school with a good Ofsted report that is taking 35 children, but does not have the physical capacity to expand. How will the pledge be delivered in that area without a reduction in parental choice or an increase in mixed age classes? The duty on the Minister is to offer a clearer and fuller explanation than he has done so far.

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"congratulates the Government on the excellent progress it has already made towards honouring its pledge that no child of 5, 6 or 7 will be in a class of over 30 by the end of this Parliament, which will mean that 100,000 fewer infants will be in large classes from this September and the pledge will be met ahead of schedule by September 2001; and notes the Opposition's continuing hostility to class size reduction, having presided over year-on-year increases since 1988.".

The Conservatives' central charge is that the Government have failed to honour one of the key pledges that we put before the electorate in the run-up to the election. We take that as a serious charge, because we intend to honour and discharge our commitment to the electorate by ensuring that those pledges are met. I welcome the opportunity provided this evening—thanks very much—by the Opposition to outline how the Government intend to honour that pledge. I should like to go beyond that and explain how the pledge can be met by not just maintaining, but enhancing, existing parental preference, and how the implementation of the pledge will ensure that we can deliver on our standards agenda. We believe that smaller class sizes help to improve the standard of education. That stands in stark contrast to the assertion of the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) that there is no correlation between class sizes and educational achievement. I shall outline why we disagree with the hon. Gentleman on that.

The motion talks about

"the Government's failure to deliver its early pledge to reduce infant class sizes".

The hon. Member for Havant made little reference to exactly what we pledged. The Labour party manifesto says, on page 7:

"We will reduce class sizes for five, six and seven-year-olds to 30 or under, by phasing out the assisted places scheme".

Our pledge card, which every loyal Minister keeps in his or her top pocket, says almost exactly the same:

"Cut class sizes to 30 or under for five, six and seven-year-olds by using money from the assisted places scheme."

That is the pledge. We made a clear link between the phasing out of the assisted places scheme and the reduction of class sizes.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): Is the Minister telling the House that there never was a commitment to fund class-size reduction solely from the phasing out of the assisted places scheme? The House will recall some of his earlier remarks suggesting something very different.

Mr. Byers: I shall come to the timing of the delivery of the pledge. The hon. Gentleman will see that we always intended that it would be delivered by the end of the Parliament. The additional resources provided as a result of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget, particularly the £40 million capital, enables the pledge to be delivered early. That is why the additional resources are necessary. I hope that the hon. Gentleman would support the Government in providing additional spending in order to deliver on the pledge.

Mr. Foster indicated assent.

Mr. Byers: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman supports the Government in our efforts to reduce class sizes.

We felt that it was important to demonstrate how revenue spending on the assisted places scheme could be used to employ more teachers and to reduce class size. That is exactly what the pledge states, and that is exactly what we shall do—showing that the Government act for the majority of our children and not just the few.

It is worth reminding Conservative Members that the assisted places scheme provided independent sector places for 38,000 young people and that the revenue from phasing it out will provide smaller classes for nearly 500,000 five, six and seven-year-olds. That is a clear demonstration of the Government's priorities, which are in clear contrast to policies of the Conservative party, which represents the vested interests of the few—that is its historical role—but denies good quality opportunity to the majority.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): I find it rather bizarre that the Minister is accusing us Conservatives of standing up for the vested interests of poor children in the inner cities, whom I see being denied places in schools such as Manchester Grammar and William Hulme. I am quite happy to be accused of standing up for their vested interests. I thought that the Labour party used to try to stand up for such vested interests. It is clearly now failing to do so.

Mr. Byers: We do. The great difference is that we believe that those children should be provided with good quality education in the maintained sector and should not have to rely on the independent sector. Our view is that we can make far better use of the more than £100 million of public money a year that was spent on the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Brady: Will the Minister give way again?

Mr. Byers: I want to make some progress.

We could not phase out the assisted places scheme by Executive action; we needed primary legislation. Once in office, we acted with speed and commitment to introduce the Education (Schools) Bill, which phases out the assisted places scheme and releases the money spent on it so that we can use it for the benefit of far more young people. Within 21 days of the general election, the Education (Schools) Bill was published and given a First Reading. The Second Reading was on 2 June, and Royal Assent was given on 31 July. It was one of the first Bills to reach the statute book under this Government.

As a result of the fact that the pledge was about phasing out the assisted places scheme—which required legislation—and using the liberated money to benefit the majority of our young people, the first element of the money will not become available until September. That was made very clear—

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Byers: I want to make this point. The earliest time at which the money released from the phasing out of the assisted places scheme, which is to be devoted to, and ring-fenced specifically for, cutting class sizes, can have an impact is September. In September, it will have an impact.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Will the Minister confirm that the abolition of assisted places was only a money-saving measure? Does he therefore accept the amendment that was passed in the House of Lords, with cross-party and cross-Bench support, which will allow schemes such as that in Surrey to go ahead? That scheme does not have financial implications, but it will benefit the education of children in the county that I represent.

Mr. Byers: I am still awaiting details of the Surrey scheme. I have on several occasions asked the hon. Gentleman and the director of education for them, but still have not seen them. I await with great anticipation this much-vaunted Surrey assisted places scheme. When I see it, I shall judge it accordingly—not on dogma but on its practical realities and implications.

From September, £22 million will be available as a result of the phasing out of the assisted places scheme. That money will be used to employ 1,500 more teachers, ensuring that more than 100,000 five, six and seven-year-olds will be taught in classes of 30 or fewer. Such benefits do not extend just to the leafy shires, as the hon. Member for Havant implied. Nine thousand youngsters in Derbyshire and 8,900 youngsters in Lancashire, as well as those in places such as Gateshead and in inner-city areas throughout the country, will benefit as a result of our class-size reduction proposals.

More money will come on stream. Next year, £61 million will be used specifically for reducing class sizes. In 2000, £80 million will be used, and by September 2001, when the pledge will be delivered in full, £100 million will be available from the phasing out of the assisted places scheme. Of course, many local authorities and schools will benefit before September 2001. It is crystal clear that the pledge will be met—and under the terms that, clearly, were put to the electorate.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Byers: I want to move on to the issue of parental choice. I want to address square on the very important point raised by the hon. Member for Havant.

[Mr. Byers]

The class-size policy could be implemented in a way that would be detrimental to parental choice. The thrust of the speech of the hon. Member for Havant was that popular schools would be forced to turn children away, and that empty desks at less popular schools would be filled. If that were the intent, the policy would merely be an administrative shuffle of children around the system. Such a policy would have very limited or no cost. We would not need the £100 million in 2000 from the phasing out of the assisted places scheme. We need that money because that is not the way in which we shall go about matters. We shall target the money that is released from the assisted places scheme—as well as the extra money that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has got from the Chancellor on capital for this year—on schools that are popular with parents.

Mr. Willetts: Will the Minister give a pledge that no parent will fail to get their child into the school of their choice as a result of his policy?

Mr. Byers: I shall come shortly to how the policy will not only maintain parental preference but enhance it. I hope to be able to demonstrate that to the hon. Gentleman in just a couple of minutes.

The School Standards and Framework Bill, which is before the House of Lords, will require local education authorities to draw up plans for the implementation of the class-size reduction pledge in their areas. Those plans must be submitted to the Secretary of State for approval. I can inform the House that the Secretary of State will not approve plans that fail to demonstrate that the LEA has given due regard to the exercise of parental preference. However, we want to go further. When submitting their proposals to reduce class size, LEAs should plan on the basis of enhancing the exercise of parental preference. What does that mean in practice?

First, no child should have to travel an unreasonable distance to school as a result of the policy. Secondly, surplus places in poor schools should not be filled by keeping children out of schools that offer higher standards and a better quality of education. Thirdly, where extra places are needed, they should be created in popular, over-subscribed schools with high standards that have been demonstrated by key stage 1 or key stage 2 assessment results—which might be valued added—or reports of the Office for Standards in Education.

Fourthly, and this takes up the point raised about the Church school in the constituency of the hon. Member for Havant, the proportion of denominational provision for any denomination shall not be reduced. Finally, local education authorities should seek to increase the proportion of provision in popular over-subscribed schools with high standards. Plans that fail to meet those criteria will not be approved by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Willetts rose—

Mr. Don Foster rose—

Mr. Byers: I shall give way first to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster).

Mr. Foster: The Minister has told us that he is making these announcements to the House for the first time this evening. First, will he confirm that every one of the points that he has listed comes directly from the consultation document? Secondly, will he confirm that local education authorities were required to comment on that document by 12 June, only about two weeks ago? Thirdly, will he tell the House whether all those who responded to the consultation document said that it was possible to deliver what it contained? Did the consultation responses all support the particular points to which the Minister has referred?

Mr. Byers: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. We have consulted on many of those points. The House should be made aware of them because they were not referred to by the hon. Member for Havant when he introduced the motion. The issue is whether we should go along with the views expressed as a result of the consultation. Some reservations are held in some quarters. There are some people, and no doubt some in local education authorities, who say that what we propose cannot be done. Will the hon. Member for Havant say why they say that it cannot be done? I will tell him why that is said; it is because what is proposed will interfere with LEAs' planning processes for places. It will make it more difficult. Yes, I accept that it will make it more difficult, but this Government are not about making life easy for local government; we are about delivering high-quality education for parents and children.

It was interesting that, yet again in a contribution from the Opposition Front Bench in an education debate, the interests of parents, children and high standards were not put first. Once again, we heard about the difficulties that would be experienced by local government. That is regrettable. However, we shall put the interests of parents and children first. We shall not cave in to the vested interests of local authorities.

I read with great interest the speech made by the hon. Member for Havant at the Council of Local Education Authorities, where he talked about the time coming for Conservatives to build bridges with local government. The hon. Gentleman said that things had changed and that the authorities could forget 18 years of local government being denigrated, with its powers reduced, by the Conservatives. He suggested that, somehow, there was a new dawn, a new renaissance for local government.

Mr. Willetts: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Byers: I will in a moment.

I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that there should be a new dawn in terms of central-local government relations. The relationship should be one of real partnership, a partnership that puts the interests of children first.

Mr. Willetts: I shall tell the Minister why we find ourselves in an extraordinary position. There is an improving relationship between Conservatives and local education authorities. That is quite simple; the LEAs cannot believe that the Minister is serious when he makes those assertions. The factor is not the self-interest of LEAs, as I tried to explain. The Minister cannot have been listening to me. He has not explained how he can deliver on his assertions when a school physically does not have the capacity to build more classrooms—many schools do not have the space to do so—and is currently taking children in classes of more than 35. The hon. Gentleman produces long lists of criteria, but he does not explain how, in practice, in the real world, they can be delivered. That is why LEAs, schoolteachers and parents are losing confidence.

Mr. Byers: As for losing confidence on issues such as reducing class sizes, the way in which the hon. Gentleman's political colleagues in the other place have tried to block legislation that will reduce class sizes is an example of measures that will continue to cause loss of confidence in the Conservative party. The hon. Gentleman's party is standing in the way of a desirable policy that parents want, which is a reduction in class sizes.

Earlier, the hon. Gentleman was scornful of the front-page story in today's edition of The Daily Telegraph about the fact that we intend to give money to Church primary schools to help them with their capital costs. For the first time—

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): How many?

Mr. Byers: I shall deal with the figures in a moment.

For the first time, a Government have been prepared to say to the Churches that, if it would help them, we shall fund 100 per cent. of their capital costs. That was never done under a Conservative Government. All right, it will involve 100 schools—actually, more than 100 when the announcement is made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on Thursday. In any event, it will be 100 more than under the Conservative Government. That is the reality.

I agree that there are many Church primary schools with high class sizes. How many of them need capital money? The hon. Member for Havant did not address that in his contribution. He confused revenue, and the need for teachers, with capital. The reality is that the applications that we have received from Church authorities are being supported. The details will be made available on Thursday. It will be good news for many more than 100 Church primary schools, and they will be able to join in the crusade to reduce class sizes. I am sure that they will be delighted at that.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): Will the Minister confirm that the announcement that will be made on Thursday on Church schools will be yet again a change in Government policy? In a debate in Committee on that specific point, when I challenged the hon. Gentleman on the resource implications for Church schools, he said that the Churches were quite happy because they would be able to meet the resource implications. We now find that they cannot meet those implications and that the Government will have to move in.

Mr. Byers: Unfortunately, the hon. Lady did not specifically refer to the dates of our exchanges in Committee. Off hand, I cannot remember them. However, I think that they would have pre-dated the Budget statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Therefore, I would have been unable to say—[Interruption.] If the hon. Lady will wait for a moment, I shall let her know exactly what the Churches were invited to respond to. The letter that went out from the Department explained to the Churches that, if they wanted to, they could have the 15 per cent. made up by central Government, and that, if they chose not to, that was fine. It was a choice for the Churches themselves to make. The majority of them have responded positively to that choice, saying, "Yes, it is a Government initiative that we want to be part of in reducing class sizes." As a result, well over 100 Church schools will benefit from the additional capital that we are making available.

The reduction in class sizes should not be seen as a one-off step to improve the standards of education that we are offering. We believe that the reduction will make an important contribution. That is because we believe that smaller class sizes, especially in early years, make a difference to the quality and standards of education that can be offered.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Byers: I want to make some progress.

In reducing class sizes, we have the support of Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools, Chris Woodhead, who said in 1996:

"Our class size report"—

Ofsted's class size report—

"looked at whether there was any connection between the number of children in the class and the quality of education. With early years, that is 5 to 7 years of age, we agree: there was a connection."

He gave some advice, saying:

"And we think"—

Ofsted thinks—

"that if this government"— that was the Conservative Government—

"or any subsequent government is going to find more money it ought to invest that money in early years education."

That is exactly what the Government are doing.

That stands in stark contrast to the Conservative Government's approach. The then Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), said that there was "no accumulated evidence to link class size with attainment."

The hon. Member for Havant, in that little red book entitled "Why Vote Conservative?", states that "there is little evidence of any correlation between class size and educational achievement."

It would be interesting to know whether he still holds that view. We did not hear during his contribution whether that was the case. Now that the hon. Gentleman speaks for the Conservatives on education matters, it would be helpful to know whether he still subscribes to the view that he expressed in that pamphlet.

Mr. Willetts: I shall tell the Minister how this can be resolved. All that the hon. Gentleman needs to do is to publish the results, school by school, of the national curriculum tests at the end key stage 1, and in the same information publish the class sizes in those schools. That would finally resolve a question about which educationists have different views. I should be happy if the Minister cast some light on that subject, but, so far, he has refused to publish the information.

Mr. Byers: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman has confirmed that he still subscribes to the belief that he expressed in "Why Vote Conservative?" That will be one of the numerous reasons why people will not vote Conservative—they see a clear link between class sizes and standards.

The Government believe that cutting class sizes will not, on its own, be enough to raise standards in the way that we want—if the hon. Gentleman said that, he would be on far stronger ground. From September, there will be a revolution in primary and early years education. At long last, there will be a place for every four-year-old whose parents want it. A daily literacy hour will be introduced as part of our £50 million national literacy strategy. All primary school teachers will receive in-service training on how to improve the teaching of basics. Those in teacher training must follow a new national training curriculum in English and maths, so that they, too, will be effective in teaching the basics.

The Tories were in power for 18 years, but did absolutely nothing to tackle the scandal of ever-increasing class sizes—indeed, they presided over year-on-year increases. Hundreds of thousands of our children were the innocent victims of the Tory Government's neglect and indifference. Now, the chapter of increasing class sizes is coming to an end. This September will be a new beginning. There will be 1,500 extra teachers and hundreds of additional class rooms, so that more than 100,000 infants will be in smaller classes.

Let the House be in no doubt—we are on course to deliver our pledge on class sizes, and we shall deliver it in a way that will enhance parental preference and play a key part not only in raising standards in our schools, but in ensuring that education becomes a valuable learning experience rather than a matter of crowd control. Our children deserve the best possible start in life, which means a high-quality education—under this Government, that is exactly what they will have.

8.1 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): Like the Minister, I, too, found listening to the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) somewhat surreal. It was almost as if he was trying to persuade us that 1 May 1997 was year zero and that nothing had existed before then. He seemed to be saying that the Conservative party of 1998 had no connection with those nasty Conservative Governments of the 1980s and 1990s, and that any similarity was purely coincidental.

We must remember what the Conservative Governments did—everything that Conservative Members have said tonight, and their apparent concern about class sizes, will not wipe away that record. In particular, we must remember that, in their final years in government, the Conservatives presided over year-on-year increases in class size—indeed, in every year of the Major Government, class sizes continued to rise.

The Minister was uncharacteristically unkind to the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard). He will recall the leaked memorandum that she sent to her Cabinet colleagues, in which she begged for money, saying that if schools did not receive more resources, class sizes would continue to rise. Of course, her request was rejected—there was no additional money for schools, so class sizes continued to rise.

It was no surprise that the Conservatives showed no real interest in class sizes. We have heard the views of the hon. Member for Havant, but we should not forget that Conservative Ministers expressed similar views. I am sure that the House will recall the comments of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who said in 1994 that

"there is no proven causal connection between class size and educational output."—[Official Report, 13 December 1994; Vol. 251, c. 767.]

I hope that at least one thing has become clear from this evening's debate—that we all agree that class sizes really matter. Recently, I was fortunate enough to join a number of my colleagues from the Education Sub-Committee of the Select Committee on Education and Employment, on a visit to the canton of Zurich. We were impressed by much of what we saw, but what impressed us more than anything else was, I think, the impact of small class sizes on educational output.

Mr. Hayes: I do not disagree with much of what the hon. Gentleman says, but does he at least acknowledge that, in other parts of the world, such as the far east, schools with class sizes much larger than those in this country achieve equally strong educational success?

Mr. Foster: According to some statistics, that is true—in some countries, children are crammed into classes and can still achieve reasonable results in some tests of their ability. However, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that the quality of education must be measured on something more than reasonably good raw scores in basic tests.

In the canton of Zurich, we were able to see the educational benefits that small classes could bring, as classes there were almost always of 20 or 22—they were certainly never more than 25. The Liberal Democrats have long recognised those benefits, which is why we have long advocated a reduction in class sizes. Indeed, the House may be interested to know that I was born in 1947—[Interruption.] I know that that is surprising. I was particularly interested to find out what the policies of one of our predecessor parties—the Liberal party—were in that year. At the 1947 party conference, a resolution was passed that claimed:

"The most immediate need is to reduce the size of classes in primary schools."

We have a long track record of believing that class sizes should be reduced.

The House will also be aware that, at the general election, Liberal Democrats committed themselves to class size reduction. Indeed, we went further than the Labour party. We proposed, and explained how we would fund, class size reduction for pupils not only in infant classes, but in junior classes. We believe that all primary school pupils should have the benefit of smaller classes.

The Government propose to reduce class sizes for the approximately 500,000 children in key stage 1, who will, of course, benefit from that. However, the trouble with that proposal is that it will leave, in England alone, more than 800,000 pupils in key stage 2 in classes of more than 30—indeed, many tens of thousands will be left in classes of more than 35. We believe that those children, too, deserve a better deal.

Sadly, the Labour Government, because of their adherence to the previous Government's spending plans, have been timid in their response to the educational problems created by large class sizes—indeed, they could have started to reduce class sizes earlier. Unlike the Conservative Government, they have at least started to take action, which we support, but they seem to have been concerned—I have heard nothing in this debate to allay my fears—only about whether the headlines are right, so that they receive credit for class size reduction; they have not done their homework on the details. As a result, a number of problems are coming to light. I shall not repeat the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Havant; I want to raise other questions, to which I hope the Minister will give some answers when she winds up.

Evidence that the Government have not thought this through can even be found in the pilot scheme. The House will recall that, in September, local education authorities were invited to bid for the standards fund grant 5 moneys as pilots for class size reduction. They were notified of the outcome in February, but were not notified until 20 April—with precious little time to get all the preparation done for implementation in September—that they would get the money for a whole academic year. From February until April, it was uncertain whether they would get seven twelfths of the money or money for the whole year.

Even now, the pilot authorities do not know whether—presumably subject to meeting some agreed criteria about which they have not yet been told—the money will continue into subsequent years. I hope that the Minister will listen and perhaps respond on that. Also, will they be allowed to bid for additional funds to reduce class sizes for pupils who are still in over-large classes?

Mr. Byers: I may be able to help the hon. Gentleman. The class size reduction for this September is not being carried out with a statutory underpinning—that will come through the local education authority plans, which will be submitted in the autumn. Provided that the plans from the 65 authorities that will get money from this September are satisfactory, the money will roll through into subsequent years.

Mr. Foster: The local education authorities involved in the pilot will definitely welcome that assurance, although they were not given it until that moment.

The hon. Member for Havant mentioned another concern that illustrates that the homework has not been done—funding. The Minister will not deny that he clearly said tonight that he accepts that assisted places money alone would not have been sufficient to deliver the pledge. Of course, we welcome the additional money from the Chancellor, but, without those additional sums, there is no evidence that the Government would have been able to deliver their pledge.

When I looked at the calculations, I was worried whether there would be sufficient money even with the additional funding. For example, the Minister told us in the Standing Committee on the School Standards and Framework Bill that, to deliver the pledge by 2001, 5,000 extra teachers would probably be required. To date, none of us has seen an explanation of how that calculation was made. The Minister told us—it is clearly on the record—that 500,000 key stage 1 pupils are in classes of more than 30. If all of them were put into new classes of 30—this is a simple calculation—16,500 additional teachers would be required. We accept that some of those pupils will go into classes of fewer than 30, but even if one assumes that half of the 500,000 will do so—how that can happen when the Minister has told us that parents will be able to choose the most popular schools I do not know—and only 250,000 have to be put in new classes, it will still require not 5,000 but more than 8,000 additional teachers. I confess that I do not understand how the sums add up.

Another example of how the figures do not add up is obvious from the departmental press release of 22 May, which many hon. Members will have studied and which categorically told us that the £22 million was being allocated "from the Standards Fund to recruit around 1,500 new teachers which will ensure that over 100,000 infant pupils will be kept out of large classes from this September."

I checked the figures carefully with the Library, as I do not claim to be a better mathematician than the Minister. To the starting salary for a new teacher I added the appropriate superannuation and national insurance costs and discovered that the starting figure from 1 December, when the new teachers will be in post, is £17,595 per annum. I divided that sum into £22 million, expecting the answer to be 1,500, but it came to only 1,250. Therefore, there is no money to provide for 250 of the additional teachers the hon. Gentleman is promising us.

The Minister also needs to consider some of the other concerns mentioned to him during the consultation period. As he was able to give such a clear statement about what he will do about the various criteria announced earlier in the light of the consultation, perhaps he will tell us what he can do about the concerns of local education authorities over information technology. The additional IT skills and the work necessary to produce all the data for the Department will require additional staff, unless staff are taken away from their existing activities—that is, improving standards. Will additional money be made available to help LEAs with that task?

Leaving aside the money, another question is whether, in certain parts of the country, we shall be able to find the teachers to carry out the tasks that will be required. For example, LEAs in the inner London weighting pay area collectively have a smaller percentage of pupils in classes of more than 30 than those in other parts of the country, but nevertheless face the problem of existing vacancies, which have increased to 3.6 per cent. in the past two years. They will need to find additional teachers to reduce their class sizes, but there are already a large number of vacancies in their primary schools. The Government are convinced that all that will be delivered, but how do they expect that problem to be resolved? The problem is made worse by the fact that authorities in suburban London have the largest percentage of pupils in classes of more than 30—in Bromley, it is 56 per cent. and in Kingston, 62 per cent.—and will need a large number of extra teachers. The worry is that they will suck teachers out of the inner-London authorities where it is less popular to teach, which will make life there difficult indeed.

[Mr. Foster]

We have heard mention of the problem of what to do about popular schools. The Minister has stated that, following consultation, the extra places that are needed should be created in popular, oversubscribed schools with high standards shown by key stage 1 and 2 assessment tests, which is straight out of the consultation document. If that is to be the approach, I find it difficult to reconcile with some of the other Government requirements of local authorities, not least for the provision of best value. It seems to mean that the number of vacant school places throughout the country will increase. It is difficult to know whether that is the case, because consultation has not finished on the Government's admission policies.

The hon. Member for Havant mentioned mixed-age classes; I look to the Minister for a clear answer tonight. What will happen in the case of a mixed-age class that has pupils from key stages 1 and 2—that is, both seven and eight-year-olds? May we have a clear assurance that none of the pupils will be in a class of more than 30? I assume that the Minister will say categorically that the answer is yes. After all, the pledge clearly states:

"No child aged 5, 6 or 7 will be in a class of more than 30 pupils from September 2001 at the latest."

The answer would have to be yes, but the very first paragraph of the consultation document that was issued to LEAs on 27 April says:

"A class is covered by limits on class sizes if the majority of pupils in that class are in the relevant age group."

That means that if only a few pupils are seven and most are eight, the class can have more than 30 pupils, so the seven-year-olds will lose out. That is not compatible with the pledge and will cause confusion for the local authorities bidding for funds to reduce class sizes.

Has the Minister read her own document, "The National Literacy Strategy, Module 1, The Literacy Hour", which says that schools are required to organise classes so that there are no more than five groups of children, with no more than six in each group? Like the Minister, I am not brilliant at maths, but I can multiply five by six and get 30. How can that maximum number of pupils in a class for the literacy hour be achieved when even the Government do not expect class sizes for key stage 1 to get down to 30 for this September? Key stage 2 is not even covered, so we need to know how that all adds up.

The Government have failed to do anything about school space standards. The Minister was extremely critical when the previous Government decided to abolish the minimum space standards. It is a great pity that those standards have not been reinstated, especially as many new classes will be created in the drive to reduce class sizes. We need to have an assurance that those classes will not be created in inadequate spaces.

I am well aware that the ministerial answer will be that if there are no requirements, at least there are recommendations, which appear in building bulletin No. 82, "Area Guidelines for Schools". I seek an assurance that, in the creation of new classes, there will be an absolute requirement that those recommendations be adhered to by local education authorities and schools.

Class size reduction is vital if we are to raise standards. Frankly, it is hypocritical of the Conservative party, which presided over huge and rising class sizes, to berate the new Government, so we cannot support the motion. Equally, although we welcome the Government's determination at least to get some class sizes down, we cannot whole-heartedly congratulate

"the Government on the excellent progress it has already made", as the amendment says, because that would be to ignore the numerous unanswered questions and the failure to start early enough and to go far enough.

8.22 pm

Helen Jones (Warrington, North): I confess to being somewhat puzzled by the Opposition's choice of subject. For Conservative Members to initiate a debate on class sizes is like King Herod wanting to debate child welfare. If there were educational prizes for effrontery and sheer brass neck, they would certainly be at the front of the queue.

To hear the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) speak, one would think that Conservative Members were born guiltless on 1 May 1997. They would have us believe that they are without a past, but they are not, and it is right for the House to be reminded of that past, not because we want to evade responsibility for our actions—we shall be happy to be judged on them—but because it is important that the size of the task facing the Government, and their success in taking it on, should be put into context.

Mr. Brady: I, of course, am completely guiltless and blameless. I wonder whether the hon. Lady regards herself and the Labour party as free from blame for the incompetence of many Labour local education authorities, which have been responsible for such bad performance in education throughout much of the country.

Helen Jones: The hon. Gentleman is very selective in his references. Perhaps he would like to look at recent reports on the failing schools in Westminster before pointing the finger at Labour LEAs.

Conservative Members would have us forget that, before the Labour Government took office, we had 18 years of Conservative mismanagement of the education system. I am sure that the whole country would like to forget that, but it happened. Those 18 years left 477,000 five, six and seven-year-olds in classes of more than 30. During those years, pupil-teacher ratios rose consistently and the previous Government continued to deny that class sizes had any effect on education.

The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) rightly quoted the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who said:

"there is no proven causal connection between class size and educational output."—[Official Report, 13 December 1994; Vol. 251, c. 767.]

Mr. St. Aubyn: Is the hon. Lady aware that, although there are large class sizes in Bromley, there are also outstanding academic results? That may suggest that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) knows what he is talking about in his own patch.

Helen Jones: Perhaps it suggests that the right hon. Gentleman had not read the research.

In Committee on the School Standards and Framework Bill, Conservative Members appeared to change their stance. The right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) said:

"We do not contend—and nor did the previous Government—that class size, for infant classes in particular, is wholly irrelevant."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 20 January 1998; c. 31.]

That was backtracking on previous comments. Conservative Members felt no guilt in government, because they were conscious of no obligation. Never once did they express any outrage about what was happening to children in our schools.

It is possible that the sinners have repented, and I believe in the possibility of redemption—although that belief has been sorely tested by daily contact with the Conservative party in opposition—but if they had learnt the error of their ways, why did they oppose the Bill to abolish the assisted places scheme and use that money to reduce class sizes? Why did they consistently argue that the money should be spent on a small minority of children, while children in constituencies such as mine continued to suffer large class sizes? Why did they table amendments that would have made the pledge on class sizes totally unworkable? It is no use their posing as defenders of lower class sizes now, when they sold the pass a long time ago.

By contrast, the Labour Government not only desire the end, but are prepared to put in place the means. The Conservative party found reasons why class sizes should not be reduced, but we are prepared to build for success, because we believe that many of the problems in our schools stem from a failure to devote enough resources to the education of very young children at the beginning of their school life.

I taught not in primary but in secondary education, but I believe strongly that our policy of reducing class sizes is a key part of raising standards and that money put into the education of children at the beginning of their school life will pay dividends later and prevent many of the problems that secondary school teachers now deal with. The Government are delivering on their commitment.

In my town, 800 children in what is not by any means a leafy suburb will find themselves in smaller classes in September because of money put up by the Government. That is the effect for a single local education authority in a single town. My hon. Friend the Minister has made it clear that £22 million will go to the rest of the country in September, to keep 100,000 pupils out of oversized classes. Opposition Members have opposed that at every possible stage.

In future, there will be more money. The £40 million in capital funds to be allocated to schools has already been referred to, but there will be £100 million from phasing out the assisted places scheme by 2001-02. We are determined to use that money to reduce infant class sizes, and to ensure that LEAs will not be able to do so in any way that restricts parental choice. LEAs will have to expand popular schools that have high standards, and we have consulted them on the best way in which to do that. We are no longer prepared to tolerate the failure that existed under the previous Government, when half our 11-year-olds failed to reach expected standards in English and maths, and when the reading standards of seven-year-olds were falling.

Research in the United Kingdom and in the United States has convinced us that lower class size in the early years is a key factor in raising education standards and allowing children to acquire basic skills. Parents know that. Teachers know it, too. The only people who do not appear to know it are the Opposition, whose decisions in government gave us the large class sizes that exist today, and which our Government are reducing. That is the difference between the Conservatives and Labour. They favour lower class sizes for those who can buy their way out of the state system, while we favour lower class sizes for all our children. For too long, children suffered a second-class education under Tory Governments, so that they were destined to be second-class citizens.

Most Opposition Members do not use the state education system. If large class sizes are not good enough for their children, for whose children do they think large class sizes are good enough? The Opposition's motion is a piece of political chicanery, and an attempt to dodge the consequences of their past actions. The people will not be misled. I urge the House to vote against the motion.

8.32 pm

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I bring bad tidings for the Minister from my constituency. Since the class sizes debate began, I have visited my local schools as a Member of Parliament, and as a member of the Select Committee on Education and Employment, and I have not once heard a positive welcome for the Government's policy on reducing class sizes. At one school, I was told that if class sizes must come down, the library will have to be used as an extra classroom, removing a resource available to the entire school. Another school fears that the reduction in class sizes will use the money that has previously been put into a reading recovery programme.

At the school in the village where I live, we opened a new porch in the school entrance only the other day—built with money that the Government were not responsible for finding; it was raised by the efforts of the local community. That school hopes to raise class sizes, and I asked whether the class size policy would help the school by encouraging more parents to send their children there, which would raise the numbers to 30. I was told, however, that the policy would not help the school; in fact, classes of more than 30 would be welcome as more resources would go into the school, and could be directed towards the children who most need them.

The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) told us of his recent trip to Zurich. The hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) and I also made that trip, and what the hon. Gentleman did not mention was that during 18 years of Conservative Governments here, the difference in income between the people of Switzerland and the people of the United Kingdom narrowed. People in Switzerland used to have a per capita income 60 per cent. higher than that in the UK; now it is barely 20 per cent. higher. The trend of the past 20 years has been one of economic success for the UK, which is why people in Zurich are looking to our education system to learn lessons for their own system.

We went to Zurich in a spirit of cultural exchange, intending to learn from the Swiss, but we found that the Swiss were interested in learning from us. What is more, in order to produce an education system closer to ours, they were prepared to contemplate an increase in their class sizes. Class sizes are not regarded in isolation in any other part of the world. It is a great mistake to do so here.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside): Will the hon. Gentleman clarify the Opposition's position on reducing infant class sizes? In government, the Conservatives increased class sizes. In opposition, they voted against the means to reduce class sizes. Their motion equates the reduction of class sizes with a reduction in educational standards. Will he clarify their position?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I hope to get across to the small class of Members here tonight the message that the education system will be damaged if the Government isolate one aspect of policy and make it an overriding priority. It is, of course, desirable to have smaller classes, but all education research demonstrates that unless very low sizes—well below 20—are achieved, there is no significant impact on teaching. There are other ways in which the ability and strength of a school can be improved. Lower class sizes are clearly desirable, but they cannot be sought in isolation, at the expense of other important matters.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): We have heard many times of the hon. Gentleman's support for the assisted places scheme, which he wants to continue in special form in Surrey. Does he support that scheme so that a few people can seek desirable small class sizes in private schools?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the issue of what the Minister has said. We already knew that the Minister could not multiply, but we have learnt that he cannot add up either. He told us that the saving from the assisted places scheme would be £100 million a year, but everyone who has examined the matter knows that it will be £40 million a year. The cost of his programme may be £100 million a year, and the cumulative saving after three years will be £100 million, but the Minister should check his sums carefully, because he has got them wrong again.

The abolition of the assisted places scheme, which, like many right-thinking people, I regret, has nothing to do with class sizes. The Government's class size priority will, as the Minister has admitted, cost a great deal more than the £40 million annual saving from the assisted places scheme. The cost of the new capital programme could not be announced until the Chancellor's statement—an admission by the Minister that he had put forward a policy that he did not know he could afford. The cost of that programme, and of reducing class sizes without significantly damaging parental preference or undermining the quality of teachers, will be a great deal more than will be saved from the abolition of the assisted places scheme.

It is significant that when the assisted places scheme was discussed in another place a couple of weeks ago, the Government's policy on having a say over policies on assisted places was cut down by one vote, with support from Cross Benchers and Liberals and not because of a resurgence of Tory backwoodsmen. In areas such as Surrey, where we have our own scheme which local people understand and can vote on, policy should be determined by local people. We should not have to justify it to the Secretary of State if we are not relying on additional central Government money to implement it.

Helen Jones: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Surrey scheme and said that people had been able to vote on it. Does he accept that the Government had an overwhelming mandate for their policy of reducing class sizes by phasing out the assisted places scheme, and that they have a duty to implement it?

Mr. St. Aubyn: No one is denying the Government's right to withdraw the £40 million cost of the assisted place scheme, but, on 1 May last year, the people of Surrey also gave an overwhelming mandate to the Conservative party to take back control of Surrey county council and follow sound Conservative education policies in the interests of Surrey. We object to the centralised control that lies behind both the new regulations on partnership schemes and the Government's class size plans.

We welcome any efforts to improve education. Smaller class sizes have a role to play, but, as we have heard already, in many ways the Government's scheme is too expensive and too costly, especially in terms of parental choice. How is it fair to tell parents with a child at a school that a sibling cannot go there because it would increase the numbers going into a class? How will the Minister respond? Will he say that he is prepared to sanction the building of an extra classroom in that school for siblings? Even if he were prepared to do that, at tremendous cost if it were done across the country, how could he possibly achieve it in time to deliver on his promise to satisfy the needs of those children? Many families' children will be split up or will have to travel further. Where I live and in my constituency, the problem of traffic on the roads when children are travelling to and from school will be accentuated by the Government's policy.

We have not yet heard where the extra teachers will come from. The Government have offered no incentive to teachers, and their golden economic inheritance means that there is greater demand for teaching skills in other sectors of the economy. With such a problem of teacher supply, about which our Select Committee has already warned them, how will the Minister deliver quality teachers? When I put that to the National Union of Students and the National Association of Head Teachers there was concurrence that teacher quality is as important, if not more so, than class sizes. Parents and teachers would rather have children in slightly larger classes taught by first-rate teachers than in mathematically correct classes that underperform because the quality of the teacher available is not up to the standard that children and their parents have a right to expect.

Mr. Hayes: My hon. Friend develops an interesting line of argument. Does he accept that, contrary to what was said by the Minister, Ofsted acknowledged exactly that point in its comments on the issue in 1996? Ofsted said that class size was a factor, but not the sole determinant of the quality of teaching and learning; the Labour party, however, has irresponsibly created the opposite perception among our people.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I have the latest Ofsted report. I read carefully its section on primary schools. In the priorities for action listed by Ofsted, there is not one mention of class sizes. There are important issues for our primary schools that should be addressed, but for the Government to be hung up on a soundbite—an early pledge that will be delivered late—is a betrayal not only of the children but of the trust that passed from our party to theirs on 1 May last year.

It is regrettable that, behind the smirks and self-satisfied looks of Labour Members, there have been no real answers tonight. We will leave the Chamber knowing that the Government are concerned only with presentation and not with the practical effects of their proposals or the high cost for the people whom I and my colleagues represent.

8.45 pm

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): We all know that it is the job of the Opposition to oppose, but it is revealing that, on a topic of their choice on one of their set-piece days, only six of them have turned up to oppose. That is not strong evidence that the Conservative party feels strongly about the issue.

It is the job of the Opposition to oppose, but there is a difference between opposition and disingenuous opposition. What we have heard tonight is disingenuous opposition. Their first complaint was that the Government's pledge was not happening early enough, but they know, because some have served on education committees and, I hope, know something about schools, that the pledge cannot be implemented any quicker. They know that classes are set up at the start of each school year, and that only then can one alter their configuration. They know that the classes that children are in now—the ones referred to in the survey mentioned by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts)—are the same as those set up in September 1997, and the same as those planned and organised, and for which staffing arrangements were made, back in May and June 1997, based on the budgets of April 1997 set by the previous Government.

We have always made it clear where the money would come from. My hon. Friend the Minister read out from our plastic pledge card that it was always linked to the phasing out of the assisted places scheme. Last June, we discussed the Education (Schools) Bill, which received Royal Assent in July. That was a fast pace. We could not have moved any faster, but the dates did not permit activity on class sizes to fulfil the pledge until September 1998.

The Education (Schools) Act 1997 honoured the assisted places that had already been organised for September 1997. Do the Opposition now suggest that we should not have honoured them, but should have told the children that they could not take up their assisted places in 1997 because we had to move more quickly and wanted the money right away? If so, it is the very opposite of what they argued for during the passage of the Bill, when they tabled a raft of amendments to a short, seven clause Bill—the purpose being to slow down the phasing out of the assisted places scheme. They asked for more time, for more youngsters to be kept on until the age of 13, for more of everything. In short, they wanted to delay the implementation of the class size pledge.

I made my maiden speech during the debates on the Bill, and I followed the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), whose main point was that the Bill was being rushed through without enough thought being given to it. At the time, the complaint was that we were going too fast; tonight, the complaint is that we are going too slowly.

The fact is that there was no possibility of fulfilling the pledge in 1997: September 1998 will be our earliest opportunity. Would the Opposition have us disrupt classes in the middle of the academic year? If so, I wonder what parents would say. Alternatively, we could have put in additional resources besides those liberated by abolishing the assisted places scheme. Even so, taking action by September 1997 would have been extremely difficult—schools make their plans in May. In any case, we have heard time and again that the Opposition do not want any more money spent. They have argued that the whole idea should be called off owing to a lack of money from abolishing the assisted places scheme. Indeed, they have never argued for extra resources for education.

This September, we will see the beginnings of children benefiting from the Government's policy. That would never have happened under the Conservatives. The real horror for the Opposition, of course, is that they can see that the pledge is being acted on. They can see, too, that phasing out the AP scheme is delivering the money and that the pledge will be fulfilled. So they are trying to muddy the water by confusing people about the timetable for implementation.

The second example of the Opposition being disingenuous is that they are criticising the Government for allegedly not doing something with which they wholly disagree anyway. They spent years denying that class size had anything to do with education standards. Throughout their 18 years in government, I was teaching in the classroom. Nothing infuriated teachers, parents and pupils more than hearing various Conservative Ministers say that class sizes were irrelevant. The Minister referred earlier to crowd control. Anyone who has taught large classes knows that there are times when teaching feels like crowd control—and the way to control a crowd is to reduce its size. That is, after all, the selling point of the private schools.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) has said, we witnessed some spectacular somersaults by Conservative Members in Committee—I note that they are not here today. The new Tory move to suggest that class size did count was led by the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) and by the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning). Indeed, the right hon. Member for Charnwood said:

"there is some evidence that class size has a strong influence on educational attainment for children aged five to seven."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 20 January 1998; c. 31.]

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that I spent many years as a county councillor and always acknowledged that class size was a factor. Would he agree, however, that it is most important for children with special needs? If so, does he agree with the Government's exemption from the pledge of children with special needs?

Mr. Blizzard: Class size is a factor in all types of education, mainstream and special needs. The point is that unless the Government take steps to do something about class size, nothing will happen. That is what happened for 18 years under the Conservatives, when class sizes never came down.

Mr. Hayes: It is time to nail this one. Class sizes were at their peak in 1978; Library figures show that they were higher then than in 1997. I seem to recall that we had a Labour Government in 1978.

Mr. Blizzard: It is easy to come up with all sorts of figures, depending on the starting and finishing points.

The Conservative conversion to the cause of smaller class sizes has now vanished. The right hon. Member for Charnwood and the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton have disappeared from the Front Bench. I have to say that we questioned their conversion at the time, when amendments were tabled to ensure that no movement was made on class sizes. One incredible amendment was designed to enable parents to choose whether to put their child into a class of 30. The result would have been that 30 parents could choose the legal-sized class of 30, but the 31st parent could come along and insist on a class size of 31. That is a good example of the sort of amendments that we had to put up with in Committee.

The revised Conservative policy evidenced in the motion is that smaller classes are desirable, but that nothing should be done about that. At the time of the Standing Committee's deliberations, my survey of my constituency showed that we had 25 classes of six and seven-year-olds containing more than 30 pupils—involving a total of more than 800. Thanks to the new Act, that will change during this Parliament.

As in Committee, the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) has again expressed his strong vision for education. He asked the Minister some probing questions about how the Government's plans will be implemented, but he was very weak on the specifics of his own party's plans. When he began describing Liberal policy back in 1947 or thereabouts, I thought he was going to say that his party put an old penny on income tax for education—but had since made progress because that was 1/240th of a pound whereas now 1p is 1/100th of a pound.

I read in the local press this week that the Conservatives have begun to listen to the electorate. Indeed, the local paper announced that the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) had turned up in my constituency while I was at Westminster—he made page 63 of the Lowestoft Journal, which shows just how successful his visit was. Had he really listened to parents in my constituency, he would have heard them asking not why smaller class sizes were being imposed but when it was their turn to have them. For as long as the Conservative party refuses to listen, it will remain unpopular, because people do not like a disingenuous Opposition.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), who made his case well—although that does not take much doing because there can be no doubt that, under the Labour Government, class sizes have increased. I do not doubt the sincerity of Ministers, but I profoundly disagree with their approach to this and other policies.

I am sick to death of attending in the Chamber and listening to Labour Members talk about the 18 years of Conservative government. Essex county council has been controlled by the Conservatives for only seven weeks and the leader of the Labour party jumps to the Dispatch Box and blames them for all ills, but, after 15 months of a Labour Government, no one seems to want to take responsibility.

When hon. Members speak, they tend to draw on their personal experiences, which is what I shall do. First, I shall talk about my experience as a Member of Parliament.

Mr. Byers: What—about Basildon?

Mr. Amess: If the Minister wants me to talk about my former constituency and what the Labour party did on a private matter relating to education, I shall be happy to speak publicly on the subject. In the years that I have been a Member of Parliament, I have taken a great interest in education matters—

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): In Basildon.

Mr. Amess: Yes, in Basildon. It should be to the eternal shame of the Labour party that when my wife and I decided to send our son to a non-selective, not grant-maintained Church school outside my former constituency because there was no such school in the constituency, the then former Member of Parliament for Basildon, who was at that time the leader of Havering council, decided to make a big issue of the matter and to interfere with our private lives, yet several people who now have responsibility in the Government send their children to highly selective schools. The Minister attempts to chide me about Basildon, which is now represented by two Members of Parliament, one Conservative, one Labour, but he and other Labour Members should ensure that they are better informed than they appear to be at the moment.

As I was saying, I take a great interest in education and in the schools in my constituencies, past and present. I go around schools all the time. If Ministers think that the public are pleased with what they have done in education for the past 15 months they are very wrong. Only weeks ago, not in my constituency, but in the London borough of Bexleyheath, the Conservative party won by-elections, and Bexley is now controlled by the Conservatives. I am informed by the chairman of the education committee, Mrs. Sharon Massey, that education was a leading issue on the doorstep. In May, we took seats from both the Labour party and the Liberal Democrats.

I also draw on my experience as a teacher in a primary school in the east end of London dealing with children with special educational needs. That is why I was interested in what my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) had to say about the need for class sizes for children with special educational needs to be limited to 30. In addition, while I realise that Labour Members think little of playing politics with their own children—the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Ms Squire) shakes her head, but I can assure her that the Labour party in Basildon did exactly as I described earlier—I have five children, all in state schools, so I am deeply involved in and conscious of their experiences.

I represent the constituency of Southend, West. At Question Time a few weeks ago, the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris), said that there was no problem with the size of classes in Southend and that we had spare capacity. She is quite wrong, and I shall prove that shortly. All the classes and the schools in my constituency are full, and what is happening in Southend is a disgrace.

Southend is controlled not by the Conservative party, but by the Liberal Democrats and the Labour party working together. That is why I was appalled by what the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) said about education. The Labour party's promises have not been borne out and the Liberal Democrats' claptrap at the general election about the 1p on income tax to be spent on education will never be borne out. They have controlled Essex county council for the past four years and they should be ashamed of their record. At the moment, they control Southend-on-Sea borough council.

All schools in Southend are operating at full capacity. A document written by the Conservative spokesperson, Mrs. Sally Carr, says:

"The restriction of class sizes to no more than 30 will require an absolute restriction on admissions once class sizes have reached 30".

That is what the council has decided, which is stating the obvious, but when the Minister replies, will she tell us how on earth schools in Southend will achieve that? There is no room for Portakabins. All our classes are full—they have more than 30 pupils.

I know that some hon. Members were laughing at my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn). Someone said that he is an old Etonian. My hon. Friend represents a constituency and he is entitled to give his view on behalf of his constituents. I thought that he made his case very well. Is it the case that, under this Government, if one happens to be a Conservative Member, the people one represents do not count? I hope not.

In Southend, 25 per cent. of schools have classes in excess of 30 pupils and that proportion will rise over the next year. I shall give three examples. At Prince Avenue school, which is in a challenging catchment area, the average class size for key stage 1 is 32 and increasing. The head teacher is already having to turn down pupils for next September, and many of their mums and dads are coming to my surgery. At Westleigh junior school, the average class size for key stage 2 is 32 and increasing. In year six, there is even a class of 37 pupils.

I raised the subject of Westborough school with the Minister a few weeks ago. With 800 pupils, it is the largest primary school in Essex. I sought a meeting with the Minister for School Standards about the issue, which I shall come to at the end of my speech. The school is so crowded that there is no room for any more children and the head teacher does not even have an office from which to operate. The average class size is 33 and the largest class has 35 pupils. There are four mixed classes. At present, the school can afford to employ some teaching assistants to help staff, but it will be unable to continue to do so if class sizes are decreased and alternative funding arrangements are not found.

Westborough, which is in a very challenging part of my constituency, has an acute funding problem. I had a long chat with the headmistress this afternoon. The chairman of the governing body is a Liberal and the chairman of the education committee in Southend. The headmistress and the governors do not know where the money will come from. When the Under-Secretary winds up, will she tell me—if she does not have the time, she can write to me—what is the solution to the problem of those three schools in my constituency?

In Essex local education authority area, 13,805 key stage 1 pupils and 28,850 key stage 2 pupils—40 per cent. of the total—are in classes of more than 30.

Although one or two sedentary interventions began to exercise me a little, I said at the outset that I did not doubt Ministers' sincerity—and they are courteous in dealing with correspondence—but it is galling that whereas, under the previous Government, I was able to bring representatives—the head or deputy head—from every school in my constituency to meet the Secretary of State, I am now told that I cannot have any sort of meeting with any Minister because they are too busy. That is deeply disappointing, especially as the Government tell us time after time that they are listening to the people. They are jolly well not listening to those whom I represent in Southend, West.

Mr. Byers: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and I have had a brief conversation to determine whether we can recall any correspondence from the hon. Gentleman requesting a meeting and we are unable to do so. My hon. Friend and I have a good record on meeting hon. Members from all parties when meetings are requested. If the hon. Gentleman would like to write to us—I do not remember receiving any correspondence from him, but I shall check—I am sure that we will treat his request as sympathetically as possible.

Mr. Amess: I take the Minister's words in good faith, but three days ago—this is a little embarrassing—my secretary received a call from the diary secretary to one of the Ministers to say that a meeting was not possible. As the Minister expressed his view at the Dispatch Box I felt it necessary to respond, but I take what he said in good faith and I should be grateful if he will meet some of the headmasters in my constituency.

I end by reiterating my main point about all the nonsense that has been said about saving money on the assisted places scheme. Labour Members know only too well that the Government may want to reduce class sizes—which I think will be impossible, given that our playgrounds are already overcrowded, not to mention the issue of choice—but from where will the money come? The Chancellor keeps telling us that he is relying on the previous Conservative Government's spending plans; then he says that there is to be a three-year strategy that will be more draconian. I want to know where the money will come from. Frankly, many people in my constituency feel that, under this Labour Government, they will not be able to afford children.

9.12 pm

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South): My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard), who unfortunately is no longer in the Chamber, put his finger on the issue when he distinguished between opposition and disingenuous opposition. Tonight, we have heard a great deal of the latter from the Opposition Benches.

[Mr. Gordon Marsden]

The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) referred to the year zero mentality of Conservative Members. I thought that they were more like a collection of Rip Van Winkles who have slept through the last 20 years and now suddenly discovered all these new ideas. I had hoped that, when the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) spoke, we would hear some opposition to that argument, but I could not find much of that in his speech. He said that the Conservative party understood that parents wanted their children to be educated in smaller classes, but there was precious little evidence of that while the Tories were in government. As my hon. Friends have pointed out, those of us who served on the Standing Committee saw much evidence of confusion and outright schizophrenia. I thought that schizophrenia had been confined to the previous members of the Conservative Front Bench, but it has clearly been inherited by the present incumbents.

I understand that, in some quarters, the hon. Member for Havant bears the epithet "two brains". I had always assumed that that referred to his outstanding intellectual capacities, but clearly one brain is there to operate pre-1997 and the other post-1997. By that process, the two brains, rather like something in an H. G. Wells story, are able to proceed on their way without any conflict, but, unlike in science fiction, this problem has not just dropped from the planet Zog. As has been said, the build-up of class sizes has been strong and remorseless. In 1988, 804,000 children in the five to seven age range were being educated in classes of more than 30; by 1997, the figure had risen to 1,344,000. It is instructive to ask ourselves why. What series of factors over that period produced such a rise?

In 1994 and 1996, Professor Neville Bennett of the school of education at the university of Exeter prepared an interesting report on class sizes in primary schools. It was a large survey and took into account the perceptions of head teachers, chairs of governors, teachers and parents. It is interesting to recall what some respondents to that survey said about the then Government and their policy on class sizes.

One head teacher said:

"The Government"—

the previous Government—

"has a policy (unstated) to increase class size. LMS determined budgets for schools, this was rate-capped and therefore budget was reduced. The last pay increase had to come from the budget. The only way to pay for this was by reducing staff."

Another head spoke of

"teachers in primary schools disadvantaged by a historical funding system which mitigates against smaller classes and non contact time—both sorely needed but not possible under present funding".

Another reason for the increase in class sizes was the previous Government's severe attitude to local authorities that were trying to raise their game and raise educational standards. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman), who is in her place, can give eloquent testimony of the problems that Lancashire county council experienced in that connection.

The previous Government hampered local authorities; moreover, they gave no thought to expenditure to improve the infrastructure that might support initiatives to reduce class sizes. They gave no thought to the number of classrooms that rapidly became unusable, to the number of classrooms that were prefabricated or to the continuously lengthening list of necessary repairs.

Perhaps the most significant reason for the increase in class sizes is the fact that the previous Government gave no thought to it because, as hon. Members have pointed out, too many of their own children were not educated in that system. As a result, they had no first-hand experience of the problems that were building in the primary school sector.

Thankfully, the Government have begun—speedily, as Labour Members have said—to remedy the problem. From September, £22 million will be made available to 65 local education authorities. They include my new unitary education authority in Blackpool where, from September, 1,000 pupils will be kept out of classes of more than 30 as a result of the taking of money from the assisted places scheme.

No sensible hon. Member would argue that it is easy to institute a policy of lower class sizes. There is a complex structure of schools. In my constituency there are 1950s or 1960s schools, where it would be relatively easy to implement the pledge, and schools where space will be a problem. That is precisely why the Government have not gone for a knee-jerk process of implementation, but are ensuring that the policy is implemented in a way that will not restrict parental choice. Tonight, the Minister gave a detailed and thoughtful list of the criteria that will be used. The wide range of schools also explains why the Government have given £40 million extra to build 600 additional classrooms in 1998–99, and why LEAs have been given searching and penetrating targets to institute their own strategy this autumn.

In implementing our strategy, we must take every care not to restrict parental preference. The Government have made a strong and competent start and they deserve more than the Conservatives' knee-jerk reactions and schizophrenia. No Labour Member would argue—as some Conservatives have attempted to portray us as doing—that reducing class sizes is the be-all and end-all of education policy. A measured examination of what the Government have done in early-years education shows that that policy is only part of a raft of measures. My education authority has benefited from the new class sizes initiative, but not only that. We have benefited from an above average rise in education standard spending assessment; £73,000 for reducing class sizes; £24,000 for the national learning grid; £19,000 for literacy; and a total of £1.5 million of extra allocations for 1998–99.

Those funds underline the holistic approach that the Government have taken to early-years education policy, and the pledge on class sizes is an important element in achieving those policy objectives. The Conservative motion therefore deserves to be rejected—and rejected decisively.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): As I said in an intervention earlier in the debate, I should like to nail as an untruth, or at least as a misapprehension, any statement that Opposition Members have not before spoken sensibly or in a balanced manner on education issues. Many of us, like Labour Members, have a long history of being involved in education—as teachers, governors and members of local education authorities—and, of course, we acknowledge that class size is a factor and an issue in judging the quality of teaching and learning. The crude caricature of Opposition Members drawn in this debate by Labour Members does them far less justice than it does us.

Three calumnies were preached—I use the word advisedly—by Labour Members in the run-up to the general election. The first was that class sizes were at an unprecedented level when the previous Government left office. That is certainly not true. Class sizes were not at an unprecedented high. Figures clearly show that secondary school class sizes, for example, were higher in 1978–79 than they were in 1996–97. The numbers were about the same at primary school level.

The truth is that—largely because of demographic and birth rate factors, not because of Government policy—class sizes dipped in the 1980s. I should not claim Conservative credit for that dip, any more than Labour Members should claim that the Conservatives deliberately increased class sizes through the 1990s as a matter of public policy. Such a claim simply does not bear scrutiny. The full history of class sizes—not over 15 or 20 years, but over 50 years—suggests that not public policy but demography, population growth and the birth rate have been the major determinants of class sizes, both in the primary sector and the secondary sector. However, no Labour Member has mentioned that fact in this debate.

The second calumny was that class sizes were the single most important factor in teaching and learning—in a child's educational progress. That is not borne out by the facts or by a wealth of research. Even those who take the most pro-Government perspective in educational research would argue that class size is only one of the key factors that affect a child's educational progress and the nature of teaching and learning. The truth is that the relationship between class size and educational success has as much to do with teaching and learning methodology as with anything else.

The key factor of methodology has been mentioned in this debate by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), who spoke about experience in Switzerland, and by me in my intervention in his speech when I spoke about the far eastern experience. There are a range of views on the importance of class sizes, just as there are a range of teaching methods. There are adherents to and protagonists of each of the different perspectives.

The third calumny preached by Labour before the general election was that a Labour Government would quickly—immediately—do something about class sizes. Let us be absolutely clear about that pledge. Labour Members have told us today that it was always clear that it would take five years to reduce class sizes, but I remember that during campaigning before the general election Labour party campaigners told electors—Labour party candidates who are now hon. Members may have said the same—"Your child will be better off, because your child will be in a smaller class."

Today, we have heard that many of those who currently have children in primary school will not benefit because—in the Minister's own words—the pledge will not come to its full fruition until 2001. We are talking largely about the next generation of children benefiting. That is hardly an early pledge. It is at best an early pledge delayed; at worst, it is a medium or long-term pledge in respect of many children's life experience and educational progress. I fear that parents will judge that harshly against the propaganda that preceded it.

Mr. Byers: The hon. Gentleman represents a seat in Lincolnshire, I think. This September, 900 five, six and seven-year-olds in Lincolnshire who will be in classes of 30 or fewer would have been in larger classes had the previous Government remained in office.

Mr. Hayes: The Minister will acknowledge that I did qualify my remarks. Although I said that not all children would benefit, I then hesitated and said that, to be fair, some would. However, many of the people who voted Labour on the understanding that their children would be better off will not benefit. Many parts of the country will not see an improvement because, as the Minister acknowledged openly and fairly, the pledge will not be implemented in toto until 2001. That does not accord with the impression given during, or the marketing used by the Labour party before, the election. That is why people are coming to the hard, and arguably fair, judgment that Labour has not lived up to the expectations it created.

I was about to talk about omissions from the pledge. One was the trade-off between class size and choice. We know that many large classes are the result of children being admitted to a school as a result of an appeal. It usually happens at the most popular schools, for obvious reasons. Burgeoning classes stem from the extension of choice—parents want to get their children into a particular school because of its reputation and record.

Inevitably, there is a trade-off between class size and choice. One has to make a political and educational judgment: is it more important dogmatically to put every child in a class of fewer than 30, or to place more emphasis on choice?

Mr. Brady: Would my hon. Friend care to reflect on the contradiction in the fact that the Government appear to have understood the importance of choice by accepting our policy of league tables for schools, but that, by capping numbers in classes of five, six and seven-year-olds, they are limiting choice? That limitation will not only affect parents; it will stop the good schools from dragging up the standards of the bad schools.

Mr. Hayes: It is even worse than that. My hon. Friend points out a contradiction, but there is an implicit reduction in local discretion. Local education authorities have to prioritise and, with governors and parents, they may decide to place more emphasis on factors other than class size. The Government's bland, blanket policy prevents them from so doing.

I had a state education and I have never had any parental connection with private education, contrary to the nonsense we heard from Labour Members. They talk as though the only factor that parents take into account when they choose to send their children to a private school is small class sizes. If that were the only basis on which private schools marketed themselves, they would do considerably less well. People are concerned about the quality of teaching, about leadership and about a school's ethos. Parental support is also a critical factor in a child's educational progress. Constantly focusing on class size dilutes the argument about those other vital factors and may even detract from their importance as issues to be considered in respect of the quality of teaching and learning.

[Mr. Hayes]

The figures speak for themselves. Class sizes have risen. I cited figures from the Library that are available to everyone and show that class sizes in the secondary and primary sector have risen under this Government. We may argue about why that has happened. It may be said that the Government cannot proceed with their pledge on class sizes quickly enough as there are other priorities, or that this matter is not so important to them; in any event, average class sizes have increased, but to dwell on averages is in itself deceptive. If we look at LEA-by-LEA comparisons, Labour LEAs are worse. Class sizes in Labour LEAs are typically greater. That raises questions about the historical record of those LEAs in prioritising class size. As hon. Members will know, there is nothing to stop an LEA directing money towards that goal.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: I accept that there will be variations, but will the hon. Gentleman accept—this is borne out by the allocations for this autumn—that many of the Labour LEAs to which he refers have those figures precisely because they are in areas of deprivation and need?

Mr. Hayes: LEAs in areas of deprivation and need could have chosen to place greater priority on class size and to transfer money to subsidise, if you like—in the way that many LEAs subsidised nursery education as that was discretionary expenditure head—smaller class sizes. Many LEAs have chosen not to do so, but the hon. Gentleman makes a valid point in that LEAs are particularly poorly off because, as he will know, the largest classes tend to be in the most popular schools, and the most popular schools are frequently not in Labour LEAs, for obvious reasons.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge): I wonder whether my hon. Friend would be interested to know that the average class size in Islington is smaller than in the Oratory school.

Mr. Hayes: I do not want to draw unnecessary attention to the fact that the Prime Minister is a highly privileged man who chooses to send his child to a highly privileged school, rather than the local comprehensive. I do not want to repeat that and would not do so, so I shall move swiftly on, but I also find it slightly distasteful that we have a Prime Minister with no background in local government or of using the state sector; he went to a private school with all that entails.

The hon. Member for New college, Oxford and Harvard—the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden)—speaks as though he is one of the people's champions. I note that his interests are mediaeval history, theatre and other, equally arcane, matters—not football and real ale—so when he speaks as the people's champion we have to treat that claim with a certain latitude.

The other omission from the Labour party's account before the election was the issue of the difference between schools within LEAs. Labour LEAs' failure to deal with surplus places means that a number of very small schools—some people would argue unviable schools—with relatively small classes, which are not necessarily the best or the most popular schools, are distorting the average. I should be interested to hear the Minister say in her summing-up how we reconcile this class size policy with the issue of surplus places, and how surplus places are to be dealt with in this context.

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West): I give just the example of Gloucestershire, where schools such as the hon. Gentleman has described existed and the former Secretary of State for Education and Employment refused to take action.

Mr. Hayes: I am afraid that I cannot give that intervention the credit or indeed attention that it deserves because my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) was speaking in my ear and, as I am very deaf, I did not hear it all. However, in the spirit of the Minister, when he was dealing with my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), if the hon. Lady writes to me, I shall deal with her intervention fully.

Class size is a factor in children's educational progress, but it is not the most important factor. The debate continues. The jury is still out on how important class size is. The important thing about this debate is that the Labour party, now the Government, raised expectations about immediate action on class sizes which it has failed to deliver—indeed, it has been thwarted. The British people are extremely angry that Labour has disregarded those expectations in its priorities.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside): Tonight's debate has been characterised by Tory hypocrisy. That has been clearly demonstrated by the assertion that we are choosing between smaller class sizes and good teaching. This Government offer both. When I was the leader of a local authority while a Tory Government were in power, we battled against cuts in revenue and capital, we battled to stop class sizes rising, we battled against cuts in resources and we battled to keep open opportunities for pupils in access to the arts, basic standards in education and discretionary grants in further education.

We are offering smaller class sizes where it matters most, in infant education, and expanded opportunities for all. That is the beginning of a new era. I congratulate the Government on the splendid start that they have made. I condemn the hypocrisy of the Conservatives. I hope that they learn over the next few years, as the nation gets the benefit of expanded education opportunities for all.

9.35 pm

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): The Government

"has made two pledges on class sizes and parental choice. It is in danger of failing to deliver either."

Those are not my words or the words of my hon. Friends, who have made such excellent contributions to the debate. They are not even the words of Conservative councillors. They are the words of Gavin Moore, the Labour chairman of education in the London borough of Lewisham, speaking last week at the conference of the Council of Local Education Authorities, which was reported on Saturday in The Times in the following way.

"Parental freedom to choose a child's school must be constrained if class sizes are to be reduced, Labour councillors said yesterday.

The election pledge made by Labour last year to reduce primary class sizes to under 30 pupils . . . will be impossible to achieve if parents have the right to decide which school their child attends, the councillors claimed."

The Minister dismisses the words of those local education authorities. They are the words of people who will be responsible for delivering the Minister's pledge at local level. As my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) made clear, there is real local concern about the practical implications of putting the pledge into practice.

It is not surprising that the Minister for School Standards dismisses local education authorities. As my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) pointed out, the Government are taking away local decision-making powers and centralising control in the hands of the Secretary of State.

The Minister dismissed the concerns of his Labour colleagues in local government, saying that the issues were administrative and managerial, but they are not. The concerns of councillors are about whether children can attend the schools that they and their parents want them to go to, but the issue is about more than that; it is about the quality of education that children receive in our schools.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) referred to the only analysis that has been carried out on class sizes—the Coopers and Lybrand report commissioned by the Local Government Association. Coopers and Lybrand talked to LEAs, head teachers and governors about their concerns. On the opinions of head teachers and governors, the report says:

"Whilst there was widespread support for the policy of reducing class sizes in principle, we found that many heads were not convinced that a slight reduction in class sizes in their own schools would recompense for the upheaval and loss of flexibility that could result."

The report goes on to talk about where the policy might have a negative impact:

"At Key Stage 2 (or other Key Stages) if the development causes resources to shift towards Key Stage 1 at the expense of other Key Stages at Key Stage 1 and 2 if the policy causes a change to mixed age teaching . . .

at Key Stage 1 if non teaching classroom assistants are withdrawn . . .

at schools in areas of social deprivation if the policy causes a shift of resources towards schools in more prosperous areas."

I recognise that the Minister may dismiss the Coopers and Lybrand report because it was commissioned by local government, and he has no interest in and no time for local government. Perhaps he will take some interest in the findings of research undertaken by the National Foundation for Educational Research in England and Wales, which surveyed head teachers' concerns about the practical implications of the class size pledge. The survey said:

"While supportive, in principle, of class size reduction, headteachers were concerned that fixed limits for key stage 1 classes . . . could produce three unwelcome and, they felt, adverse outcomes: the creation of more mixed age (vertically grouped) classes, even larger key stage 2 classes, and a reduced capacity to employ classroom assistants."

In other words, the pledge will hit the quality of education that children receive in the classroom.

The point about the impact on key stage 2 classes was made very clear to the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris), when she appeared in front of a number of teachers in Derby, as reported in Friday's Derby Evening Telegraph. When repeatedly challenged on the subject of overcrowding in junior schools, she replied:

"Our current priority is to fund key stage one and we don't have any plans to deal with key stage two at the moment."

In other words, children over the age of seven will suffer as a result of the Government's pledge on five, six and seven-year-olds.

All that the Minister for School Standards did in the debate was constantly to assert that parental preference would not be affected. Yet, when we got to the subject of what decisions the Secretary of State will take, we were told that he must consider only whether local education authority plans have "due regard" to parental preference—not whether it is affected. That is not a pledge to parents who are worried that their choice will be restricted as a result of the Government putting their pledge into practice.

Earlier, the Minister for School Standards refused to give the following pledge. In responding to the debate, will the Under-Secretary pledge that no parent will have a child—be they five, six or seven years old—turned away from the school of their choice due to the class size pledge? Will she also pledge that no parental appeal will be turned down on the basis of class size? We await her response to both those specific questions.

It is clear from the debate that the Labour Government's pledge was ill thought out; it was not properly planned. It sounded good, and fitted on the pledge card, but Labour did not know how it would be put into practice. It is clear from the Minister's refusal to answer all the specific questions put to him that he still does not know how the Government will put the pledge into practice.

The hon. Members for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) and for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) referred to attacks of amnesia. The brief comments of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman) implied the same. As my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) pointed out, Labour Members are the ones who have had an attack of amnesia.

The hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) made a valiant attempt to protect his Front-Bench team—I sincerely hope that the duty Whip took due notice of his contribution—on the timetable of the pledge, by saying that there was absolutely no prospect ever that it would be met in the Government's early days. [Interruption.] I say to the hon. Member for Waveney, and to the Secretary of State, who just seems to have confirmed that from a sedentary position, that if that were so, why did Labour Members tell the electorate that the pledge was an early one? That meant to the electorate that it would be met quickly. Now we hear that an early pledge is simply one about which they thought before any others. That was not what they said during the election campaign. They told members of the public, parents and teachers that there was an early pledge to cut class sizes for five, six and seven-year-olds. The public believed the Labour party and thought that the pledge would be implemented quickly.

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): Perhaps the hon. Lady will tell us whether the Conservative party is saying, as a consequence of its belief that the pledge was to be implemented by September 1998, that it expected the assisted places scheme simply to be stopped and no further children to be allowed to continue through it?

Mrs. May: Perhaps the Secretary of State would like to give a pledge now about whether the Government will implement their pledge within the life of this Parliament. Will the right hon. Gentleman give that pledge now?

Mr. Blunkett: Absolutely.

Mrs. May: The right hon. Gentleman says, "Absolutely" from a sedentary position. So we know that. Thank you very much.

When the Labour party unveiled its pledge on class sizes, when it distributed its pledge cards and when those who are not Labour Members campaigned on the doorstep, they did not provide any small print. They did not add any caveats to what they were saying. I see that the Minister for School Standards has to get out his pledge card to check whether there is any small print on it, just to remind himself of what it says. I note that the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, who will reply to the debate, has had to borrow the pledge card of the Minister for Schools Standards. I think that the hon. Gentleman said earlier that any self-respecting Minister made sure that he or she had a copy of it.

When the pledge card was produced, when Labour candidates went on the doorsteps during the election campaign, when shadow Labour Ministers in the previous Parliament were interviewed during the election campaign and prior to it, and when the now Prime Minister unveiled all the pledge posters and pledge coffee mugs, there was not any small print. There were no caveats. They did not say to parents that they would achieve the pledge only by taking away parental choice. They did not say to parents that it depended on where people lived as to how early—

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. May: No. I must make progress.

Parents were not told that it depended on where people lived as to how early the pledge would be delivered. The Government did not say to parents that they would deliver the pledge only by increasing mixed-age teaching. They did not say that they would do it by taking resources out of key stage 2 so that those children would suffer from a lack of resources. They did not say that they would do it by reducing the number of classroom assistants. They did not say that they would achieve their pledge only by refusing appeals. However, those are the implications of putting the pledge into practice.

That is the reality and that is what will happen to parents and children throughout the country. They will find that choice is being taken away from them. They will find that other classes will suffer. Head teachers will say, as they say to me and to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West, that they have real concerns about the impact of putting the Government's pledge into practice in the classrooms. The reality is that the Government have failed to deliver on an early pledge, and they have failed to deliver the truth to the electorate.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Estelle Morris): I have spent three hours listening to the debate; I am a very disappointed person having listened to what Opposition Members have said. I am still not clear about what they really think about class size. I was in a Standing Committee earlier this year and I heard the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) say that "there is some evidence that class size has a strong influence on educational attainment".—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 20 January 1998; c. 31.]

I thought that that was a conversion; I thought that Opposition Members had seen the light. I thought that today, we would see some sort of revivalist rally—some sort of coming-out celebration—where one Opposition Member after another would say, "Yes, we were wrong. We have seen the light and we have been converted." However, they did not say that. I do not believe that any of them, with the exception of the right hon. Member for Charnwood, has changed his or her mind about whether class size matters. It is interesting that the right hon. Gentleman has gone off to think for the Conservative party; I can only hope that he will have more influence on the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) who, having taken over as shadow Secretary of State, has spoken in stark contradiction to what the right hon. Gentleman said in Committee.

Conservative Members may show empathy and say that they want to reduce class sizes, but, at every turn, and again tonight, they have spoken and voted against the means of doing so. Last July, they voted against securing the money and, last year, they opposed the Bill that would have made the reduction possible. Now that we are implementing our pledge, they are warning of imaginary obstacles.

To be fair—we always want to be fair—I must give Conservative Members some credit. There is a yawning chasm between even what they have said tonight and what they did when they had the chance to act on the issue. We have heard three hours of pious words, but they do not make up for 18 years of hopeless inaction. We have heard siren voices galore, but why were those same voices not raised when the Conservative Government were in office? Did we hear any Conservative Member protest when, year after year, class sizes rose? Did we hear a murmur from any of them when, just before the general election, the number of infant children in classes of more than 30 hit the 500,000 mark? More than 4,000 of those infants were in classes not of more than 30, but of more than 40. Given the Conservative party's record, can anyone take seriously what it says today about class size?

As if the Conservative party's preaching about class size was not audacious enough, we have had to put up with a lecture by the shadow Secretary of State on the fulfilment of election pledges. That is the big conversion of the night—a member of the previous Government worrying about whether Governments keep their election pledges. However, not one Conservative Member has said, "Sorry we got it wrong; sorry we were so mistaken about the importance of class size." Not one of them has said sorry to the hundreds of thousands of kids whom they let down, or sorry to the parents and teachers who wanted and deserved better.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) said, the Conservatives act as if the past 18 years did not happen. They may wish that that were so—indeed, I wish that it were so—but parents, teachers and the Government cannot act as if it were; we have to pick up the pieces and face up to the consequences of the 18 years of Conservative Government. The fact that the Conservative Government cut budgets year after year and forced up class sizes had a direct effect on educational standards. We inherited a situation in which more than four out of 10 11-year-olds had not effectively mastered literacy and numeracy. One reason—it is not the only one—why that is the case is that class sizes were too large in those children's early years. That is the Conservative party's record on class sizes—we are putting it right, as we promised we would, and we are doing so ahead of time.

From this September, 100,000 five, six and seven-year-olds in 65 local authorities across the country—both Conservative and Labour controlled—will be kept out of classes of more than 30. Moreover, 1,500 extra teachers will be, and have been, recruited to teach those children, and £40 million will be spent to build new classrooms. By 2001, the pledge that we made to the electorate before the general election will be honoured in full and ahead of time.

Equally important, reductions in class size are only part of the wider strategy to raise standards—the hon. Members for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn), for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) and for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) were right about that, if about nothing else. The 100,000 children who go into smaller classes in September and the children who join them in smaller classes in the next few years will also learn in school buildings that, in some cases, have had repairs for which they have waited for years. They will read better and they will master numbers better because they will be taught by teachers who have been retrained in best practice, and because money has been put in the classroom for the most modern resources. They will use new technology because we shall have ensured that schools are equipped and teachers trained. They will learn both in and outside school because by 2002, one in every two secondary schools and one in every four primary schools will have the opportunity of a homework centre.

We need no lectures from any Conservative Member about class size not being the only thing that matters. We know that it is not. All those initiatives and many more that have been announced are properly funded and, together with class size, will make a real difference to the life chances of children.

The hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) went into semantics about when is an early pledge not an early pledge but, whether it is one year or three, it is a damn sight quicker than 18 years with no action. The hon. Lady wittered away about parental choice. I think that choice is important, but, under the previous Government, the number of appeals by parents who did not get their first choice of school shot up year after year, and they took no action.

Mrs. May: If the Minister is saying that parental choice is so important to the Government, will she now give the pledge asked of her and of the Minister for School Standards, that no parent will find that their preference for a school is refused because of Labour's class size pledge?

Ms Morris: When my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards opened the debate, he made it clear that local authorities would not be able to meet the class size pledge by reducing parental choice. We have taken action to ensure parental choice, which is far more than the Conservatives ever did in 18 years in government.

While Conservative Members work out what they think about class size, we have been getting things done. We secured the money with one of the first Bills to receive Royal Assent—the Education (Schools) Bill—and it has already been passed to schools in the first full academic year on which we had an influence. More places in popular schools that have high standards—that is what parents want and, with this Government, that is what they will get.

The Conservatives have shown tonight that they are still in that state of confusion. They have still not understood the urgency of cutting class sizes. This September—only a few months away—100,000 children will benefit because we are keeping our promise. By 2001, classes of more than 30 for infant schoolchildren will, for the first time in the history of this country, be a thing of the past. That is good news for parents and for teachers, but most of all, it is good news for the children who need that best start if they are to reach their potential and have a real chance in life.

What we have heard tonight is no more than cynical scaremongering by Conservative Members, but their words cannot take away what many parents already know—that Labour is delivering. We have shown that already and we will continue to show it in the next three years. The Opposition motion is nothing more than a cynical attempt to detract from a Government who are delivering on their pledge. It is not worthy of the support of the House and I urge hon. Members to reject it.

Resolved,

That this House congratulates the Government on the excellent progress it has already made towards honouring its pledge that no child of 5, 6 or 7 will be in a class of over 30 by the end of this Parliament, which will mean that 100,000 fewer infants will be in large classes from this September and the pledge will be met ahead of schedule by September 2001; and notes the Opposition's continuing hostility to class size reduction, having presided over year-on-year increases since 1988.

Wembley Stadium

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Janet Anderson.]

10.14 pm

Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe (Bradford, South): By this time tomorrow evening, we shall know the fate of the England football team, which will be playing Argentina. I am sure that all hon. Members wish the team good luck. We have all been captivated by the excitement of the world cup and the skills on display; similarly, we all recognise its beneficial impact on the economy of the host country. That is why we all look forward to England winning the bid to host the world cup in 2006.

Tonight's debate is about the future of Wembley stadium, the spiritual home of football. Those of us who have played there or been supporters there would be happy to see it redeveloped, but the reason for this debate is that a number of colleagues and I are concerned that the redevelopment is not taking place as smoothly as it might. We are worried about the speed at which the stadium is to be redeveloped.

In April 1995, a competition was held to evaluate proposals for a national stadium, which was to accommodate football, athletics and rugby. Over a six-month period, five bids, including one from Bradford, were considered. The feeling at the time was that the process was a bit of a sham, because everyone knew that Wembley needed redeveloping. Many of us argued that there should be two national stadiums, one in the north and the other in the south at Wembley, to complement redevelopments at Hampden park, Murrayfield and Cardiff.

History shows that Wembley was selected and that the other bids, although credible, all failed. The feedback, limited though it was, implied that the Bradford bid was too commercial—but Bradford's case was very strong. Bradford can be accessed by 10 million people in an hour and by 20 million in two hours. Two international airports are within an hour's drive, and the Euro-ports on the Humber and the west coast ports are all within two hours' travelling time. I hope that the door will not be closed on a stadium of the north—I hope that it will be actively considered.

We all want Wembley to be redeveloped and wish the English National Stadium Trust well in its endeavours. However, owing to a combination of events, I understand that progress is slow and unconvincing. Of the £140 million available, £103 million will have to go Wembley plc for the sale of the leasehold. Wembley plc is making a great deal of money out of Wembley stadium; many of the supporters who go there are from the north. The sale needs to be completed quickly and contracts need to be exchanged.

The Sports Council, which is also a partner, intends to hold a golden share to prevent the stadium from being sold on for future housing development, and so on. The Football Association is embroiled in complex issues such as covenants for games at Wembley for the next 20 years, and raising £200 million to spend on the stadium. The trust will hold the freehold, and the lease will be handed to the FA at £1, for 125 years. As planning permission is required, a start must be made on all the grand plans within the next 12 months to meet the deadlines.

Brent council has worked well with the trust, requiring social amenities under a section 106 planning agreement, at a cost of more than £45 million; but the trust is not a commercial operation and money needs to be found to ensure progress soon. There is a lot of good will among the parties involved, but it needs to be turned into meaningful action. I hope that the Minister will be able to provide both leadership and answers to the outstanding questions.

One such question is: will buying the freehold from the current owners leave the trust with enough funds to complete the redevelopment? Another is: will the issues surrounding the section 106 agreement be resolved? Will the funding from other sources be available? Has the contract between the Sports Council and the trust been signed? And what is to stop Wembley plc entering a deal with Arsenal football club? I hope for answers to all those questions; I also hope that the viability of a stadium in the north will be considered.

There will be a development in Bradford and, if the £140 million had been available at the time, I am sure that our stadium would have been in place. We are seeing developments in Manchester and Sheffield and investment in many of the football and rugby grounds in the north, but we can develop and sustain two national stadiums. I hope that we have the opportunity to host the world cup in 2006 in stadiums that are equivalent to, if not better than, those in France. I am sure that my hon. Friends will talk about the impact on their communities and the need for Wembley to be redeveloped as quickly as possible.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe) on securing the debate, which is one for which I, too, have been petitioning the Speaker's Office for many months. I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me some minutes from his own allocation to speak as one of the local Members of Parliament. I hope to be able to repay his generosity in kind in future.

The basic business structure of the national stadium is becoming clear: the FA will raise £200 million and the Sports Council will put in £120 million; the English National Stadium Trust will hold the freehold of the stadium and its narrow curtilage; but Devco, the development company currently owned by the trust, will be transferred to the FA. Devco will have a board ultimately comprised of 12 people: seven will be FA appointments by right, and five will be transferred across out of the trustees of the ENST, who are 10 in number. It is Devco which will ultimately be responsible for the emergence of the new stadium and for its continued operation, because it is Devco which will have the 125-year lease on the site. That is why the composition of the 12-man board is so critical.

Under the guidance of Ken Bates, the board will no doubt have a strong chair, if not one who will always score the highest marks for tact and charm—at Chelsea, Ken Bates has certainly proved that he can get things done. However, if Wembley is to be a national stadium and not just the FA's stadium, it is vital that the seven FA representatives on Devco's board are balanced by the five transferring trustees from the ENST. Yet, of the 10 trustees of the ENST, five were nominated by the FA in the first place. I believe that a monumental fix is about to take place, where 11 of the 12 members of the board of Devco are either directly or indirectly nominated by the FA. I look to the Minister to ensure that that does not happen.

I have here a copy of a letter from the FA to the English Sports Council, which sets out what the FA calls

"the position following recent meetings with The Sports Council and The English National Stadium Trust".

The letter states:

"In particular:

1. The English Sports Council has grant-aided to The English National Stadium Trust £120 million.

2. The English National Stadium Trust will buy the business of Wembley Stadium Ltd. for an amount not to exceed £103 million subject to due diligence. Completion will be no later than June 1999. This is not conditional on either planning or funding being in place . . . Grant aid shall be used to meet the professional fees and architect fees in the design phase of the project. Neither The Football Association nor the development company shall be responsible for any costs in relation to any infrastructure improvements and/or section 106 agreements."

What concerns me is the way in which the FA appears to believe that it is possible to create an 80,000-seater national stadium without worrying about things like public transport infrastructure, new roads, or other environmental improvements, which will be vital to that stadium's success.

Of Wembley's visitors, 55 per cent. arrive via Wembley Park underground station. It is a dilapidated, urine-stained, outdated station, which has no proper crowd-management facilities to meet the requirements of a world cup bid. In response to a written question tabled last week, my right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport today wrote to me as follows:

"Following the Deputy Prime Minister's announcement of a Public/Private Partnership for London Underground and an additional £365 million of funding for London Transport over the next two years, LT and the Government have been considering together what additional investment projects should go ahead in the next two years. London Underground has proposals for a comprehensive redevelopment of Wembley Park Station, including improved platforms, Canopies, Ticket hall, Staircase and walkway. Subject to that review, and securing substantial contributions from outside parties, London Underground has indicated that construction of the Wembley Park Station redevelopment could start in 1999/2000."

The Minister referred to substantial contributions from outside parties. These are, of course, usually achieved through the very section 106 agreements that the FA letter scorns.

Major questions of public confidence must be answered. First, will any conditions be placed on the Sports Council grant to protect the £120 million of lottery money? Secondly, what controls will there be over the future use and operation of the stadium? Thirdly, who will approve the contract between the Sports Council and the FA, and can the Minister assure us that that will be done at the highest ministerial level?

If the stadium is to be a national stadium, it is right that the nation should be proud of it and have a stake in it. At the moment, Wembley is set in the midst of a car park, surrounded by derelict and semi-derelict warehouses and flanked by a rundown industrial estate. I urge the Government to announce that they will invest in the regeneration of the surrounding area. If they do not, the new Wembley stadium may become a jewel set in the midst of dereliction. I urge the Minister to see the wider vision for the future of Wembley and the people around it, whom I represent.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe) on securing this Adjournment debate. I want to make two brief comments.

First, I share my hon. Friend's view about the importance of the speedy redevelopment of Wembley as the national stadium. Wembley has an enormous impact on the economy of the surrounding area and supports many service jobs in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner). Harrow town centre is extremely close to Wembley stadium—which many of my constituents enjoy and where many of them work—and depends in part on the resources brought to the area by those visiting the stadium. I seek the same assurances as my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South that the development of Wembley will be completed speedily and effectively.

Secondly, a modernised national stadium will clearly be crucial to the success not only of our 2006 world cup bid, but of our London Olympic bid for 2012. While Wembley is the centrepiece of our national game—it is the home of football—I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can offer reassurance that its redevelopment will ensure that it is modernised and capable of being the centrepiece also for an Olympic bid.

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Tony Banks): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe) on securing this debate, and I welcome the contributions of my hon. Friends the Members for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) and for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas). I share their aspirations and, perhaps, some of their concerns.

I simply do not have the answers to some of my hon. Friends' questions, and I shall not flannel my way around them. I shall examine them and give considered responses, because they are serious questions and merit good and proper answers. The construction of a national stadium is crucial. This might be the last comment that I ever make at the Dispatch Box, but there are times when one has to admire the way that the French secured their national stadium. They went straight out and did it, as they did with their fast rail link for the channel tunnel. They do not muck about and go around with begging bowls asking people whether they would throw in a few coins. I rather like that approach.

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey): Much as I admire the French, there is a 10-year debt on the stadium in Paris, which we would not want to carry.

Mr. Banks: There is always a down side, which is why we shall not approach matters as the French have done. However, there are times when I admire the French approach.

The construction of Wembley is crucial to all the matters that have been raised. Wembley was selected as the preferred bid for the national stadium following a two-stage selection process. At stage one, three bids were rejected. The Sheffield bid proposed two stadiums on one site and did not comply, while Birmingham's bid involved a site in the green belt which did not have planning consent. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South referred to the Bradford bid. These are old issues, but it is worth putting the facts on the record. I know that the English Sports Council was impressed with Bradford's proposals. The concept had strong local support and there was genuine enthusiasm for the new ideas. However, the Bradford bid was eventually rejected on the ground of transportation. It would have required substantial investment to provide the necessary public transport and road access.

At stage two, Wembley was preferred to the competing bid from Manchester. It had significant access advantages, given the existing transport infrastructure. However, both sites were successful in attracting funding. Investment was promised to Wembley as the site for the new national stadium and to Manchester for the 2002 Commonwealth games.

It would be unreasonable to expect that there would not be difficulties with Wembley. We knew that there would be difficulties, and there are difficulties, in trying to plan a project of this size. There are difficult negotiations still to overcome. However, the English Sports Council's objectives remain clear—to build a world-class stadium within an appropriate setting; to provide 80,000 seats with appropriate public access; to secure benefits for the development of sport from the project; to provide a stadium for the three sports of football, rugby league and athletics; to ensure that the stadium can be developed with a maximum grant from the lottery of £120 million; to ensure that the project is completed by 2002; and, finally, to ensure that the project meets the English Sports Council lottery sports fund eligibility criteria, including viability and quality.

To ensure the last of those objectives, the English Sports Council is, naturally, keeping a close watch on the costs of the project. I am sure that hon. Members appreciate that, for a variety of commercial confidentiality reasons, I am unable to provide a detailed breakdown of the total costs, now estimated at about £320 million. However, as it currently stands, the rough breakdown is £103 million for the purchase of the site and £217 million for demolition, construction, planning and design. Some £120 million will come from the lottery, with the rest being made up of debt financing via the FA. That is one of the problems; it is a national stadium, but the FA—I am not here as an apologist for it—is being required to find £200 million. Consequently, it will not be just Ken Bates who will give me grievous bodily harm of the ear; it will be the FA generally. As it will have to borrow that £200 million against the income that the trust will receive through England games, it will want a large say in what happens. We can hardly blame it for demanding that.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): Perhaps my hon. Friend, like me, is worried about the nominations from the FA, which are very unrepresentative of football. All the nominations bar one come from the premier league teams. The one that did not was made only because it involved the chairman of the football league, who happened to represent a town that very nearly got into the premier league. If it is to be a truly national stadium, it is worrying that only a minority section of football will command its management.

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend makes a good point. I know that when Hansard is read by the FA, the trust and the others involved, those matters will be considered. I am not trying to tell my hon. Friend that I have detailed control over these events on a day-to-day basis. As I have said in the House, that is what the arm's-length principle is all about; we let other people get on with it. However, my hon. Friend has raised a good point, which the FA must take seriously.

I want to pick up on some other points. Devco must be representative of all the interests that will be involved in the redevelopment of Wembley. As I said, this is a national stadium, so we must consider Wembley in its wider context. It is not only about building a new national stadium, but about infrastructure investment. It is about the regeneration of the entire area. I feel ashamed going to Wembley and saying, "This is our national stadium at the moment." It might be a venerable institution, but it is long past its sell-by date. That is why we want to proceed with the demolition of the old Wembley after the cup final next year, and with the construction of the new Wembley by 2002. Some of those issues have yet to be resolved, because we need to consider the regeneration of the entire area.

Obviously, those matters are well beyond the remit of a humble Sports Minister standing at the Dispatch Box. I imagine the Chancellor of the Exchequer—probably at this moment—being given a briefing on what I am saying about the likely cost implications for the Exchequer. Obviously, the Deputy Prime Minister will be involved because of the involvement of English Partnerships and the single regeneration budget, and the necessary development of the transport infrastructure. All those Departments and all those Ministers are involved. However, if—as I keep saying—it is to be a national stadium, we must get ourselves together to ensure that it works. We do not want a half-hearted effort that does not stand the test of time and does not give us the things that we want—the centrepiece of our bid for 2006 and, perhaps, the centrepiece for a future Olympic bid, if the British Olympic Association is prepared to submit it.

Does one regard the FA, putting in that £200 million as a developer for the purposes of section 106, as one would any other developer that exists to make a profit? I may be wrong, but I make a distinction between the FA as the major putter-up of the funds and borrowing £200 million, and someone who wants to develop for private company purposes and make a profit from that development. I believe that such developers must be expected to put a considerable amount back into the community for the profits that they take out of it. I do not quite see the FA in the same role as a large property developer in London.

Mr. John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington): As the Minister is aware, in a former life I was involved in the establishment of the English National Stadium Trust. The question that is posed to him directly is: who protects the public interest in all this? In reality, this is the largest development that the Sports Council has ever been involved in, and, to a certain extent, I consider it not out of its depth, but certainly inadequate in the negotiations with a body such as the FA, because when one negotiates with the FA, one lies down with a tiger. The onus is on the Minister to protect the public interest. Although I accept his relatively hands-off approach, a more day-to-day overview is required to ensure that the public interest and the London interest are protected, especially with regard to the environment.

Mr. Banks: I agree with my hon. Friend. I can assure him that if I had not previously been convinced of that point, the serried ranks behind me would quickly have concentrated my mind on it. Of course the public interest must be protected. After all, £120 million not of Government money, but of public money, will be involved.

One needs to safeguard public money, but there is a—perhaps marginal—qualitative difference between lottery money and straightforward Exchequer grant money; in the latter case, there is an obvious, direct and deliberate connected ministerial responsibility. I have to follow—we all do, as this is lottery money—the arm's-length principle, but, if anything went wrong, Ministers would be held to account, you can bet your life on it, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That being so, I do not want to get the sharp end of the stick poked in my eye at some future date; I want to ensure that things go smoothly.

I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. McDonnell) that Sir Rodney Walker's involvement in the negotiations until now has convinced me that, whatever else one says, he is not the type of person one can easily walk over, either. Some pretty tough cookies are involved in the negotiations. I understand that absolute priority is given to preserving public funding while ensuring that this development goes ahead.

It is important that we ensure that there is proper regeneration of the entire area around Wembley stadium. I understand, of course, that Brent council is committed to making the new stadium a success, and is developing positive working relationships with all parties involved in bringing about a transformation of the stadium and areas around it.

Making Brent a priority area for the Greater London authority seems to be a development which we can look forward to. I return to the comment of my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North about London—as Wembley is the national stadium, it is, naturally, located in London. I say "naturally" because London is where people want to make such big investments. If such people come to the United Kingdom, they want to come to London. Speaking as a London Member rather than as a Minister, I think that that is right.

The recent White Paper contained proposals for new regional development agencies which, working in partnership with central and local government, businesses and other key regional interests, will bring greater coherence and a sharper regional focus to the public resources available to promote development and regeneration. Our plans for London differ from the national picture—reflecting the influence, importance and uniqueness of our capital city—and impact on the proposals for Wembley. As endorsed by Londoners, there will be a directly elected mayor and a separately elected assembly, and any decisions on priorities for funding will eventually be for the mayor and the assembly to take.

I know that hon. Members are concerned about progress with Brent on the planning brief, and I am aware that there are difficult issues, which need careful consideration. That is why we have asked the Government office for London to chair a working group, to establish the principles of the planning application connected with the Wembley site. It will aim to facilitate agreement between the English National Stadium Trust development company and Brent. One of the specific issues on which it will focus is the best way of achieving an integrated public transport system.

I know that accessibility by public transport will be central to the new stadium's success. The public transport factor has been reflected in the focus of the Government office for London. We are also in regular discussion with transport operators, with a view to improving the three main stations serving the stadium and bus penetration into the Wembley complex.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North asked some specific questions about timetabling. I understand that, on 6 to 7 July, the English Sports Council will consider the grant application for the next phase—by which time all key agreements and project structures will be in place, and the feasibility studies on planning, funding and development issues will be concluded. I am therefore expecting that to happen in the next week.

In July 1998, contracts will be exchanged with Wembley for site acquisition. Also in July, design team appointments will be confirmed. In November to December, planning applications will be submitted. In April to May 1999, planning consents and the section 106 planning obligations agreement will be completed. In September 1999, secured partnership funding will be completed. Also in September, site work will start. The site work will be completed by the spring of 2002.

That is the timetable, although I expect that there will probably be some slippages in it. Such projects tend to happen that way. I expect also that there will be some movements on the budgeted figures. However, I come back to the original point: Wembley will be the national stadium. Therefore, there must be greater national involvement, particularly in determining the planning infrastructure context for Wembley.

It is important that we make a success of the project. I do not want it to turn into the equivalent of Blue Streak. Was it Blue Streak?

Mr. Wyatt: The opera house.

Mr. Banks: No, I think that the opera house is going quite well. I do not want it to turn into one of those great English disasters. It has to work. As hon. Members have said, a new Wembley is crucial to the United Kingdom securing the great international sporting events that the Government have pledged themselves to go for. It is necessary to support the British Olympic Association in a potential Olympic bid, and to secure the world cup in 2006.

Going back to the original point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South, we are all hoping that tomorrow we shall see England secure a great victory over Argentina. I predict that the score will be 2-1, with Michael Owen scoring both our goals. Then we can move on to greater sporting success, with a new Wembley.

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Kidderminster Hospital

1. Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): If he will visit south Shropshire to assess the effect upon the local community of proposals to reduce the range of facilities available at Kidderminster hospital. [46601]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Paul Boateng): The ministerial team conducts a wide-ranging programme of regional visits. I take particular interest in the west midlands, as the hon. Gentleman will know. I have no immediate plans to visit south Shropshire.

Mr. Gill: My constituents will be disappointed by that reply. I and they are conscious of the fact that Kidderminster hospital is not the only hospital in this country to be facing either closure or cuts. There are many testimonials to the Labour party's broken election promises. May I remind the Minister of what his colleague the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Lock) said during the election campaign? He said:

"We will only prevent further cuts at Kidderminster if the Government provides enough money to the Health Authority to fund the hospital"?

Mr. Boateng: The hon. Gentleman well knows that the agenda at Kidderminster is not a cuts agenda. He is well aware—because he has been a party to them—of the discussions that have taken place between his health authority and all parties interested in the Kidderminster hospital. Submissions will come to Ministers in due course, and decisions will be taken in the best interests of all the people of Kidderminster.

Mr. David Lock (Wyre Forest): Is not a high standard of care provided by the staff and management at Kidderminster, which led to that hospital getting a charter mark last year? Does not the hospital deserve praise for its fall in emergency admissions? In comparison, every other hospital in the west midlands has seen rises. Will my hon. Friend accept the thanks of my constituents for the extra £13.5 million of Government money provided since the election to Worcestershire health authority, which will give the possibility of options for Kidderminster? Must not all those important factors be taken into account by his right hon. and hon. Friends when deciding the best configuration for acute services in the county?

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend is a stout defender of the interests of the NHS in his constituency, and I join him in thanking all those who have contributed to the success of the hospital and its earning of a charter mark. The Government are committed to making sure that there is investment year on year in the NHS to enable its staff to deliver the high-quality health care that is the due of each and every person in this country. That is why the Government have found an additional £2 billion for the NHS since the last general election—money that the Conservative party would never have found.

Dental Services (Shropshire)

2. Mr. Peter Bradley (The Wrekin): What steps he is taking to meet the dental health needs of the people of Shropshire. [46602]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): Seven investing-in-dentistry funding requests from Shropshire health authority have been approved to make national health service dental services available to thousands in the area. Access to NHS dentistry should also benefit from the approval of a first-wave personal dental service pilot in Shropshire, due to commence on 1 October 1998.

Mr. Bradley: Many people will benefit from the £19 million that the Government are putting into NHS dentistry. Some 20,000 people in Shropshire—my constituents, as well as those of the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill)—will benefit from the schemes. However, can my hon. Friend give any hope to the remaining 36,000 people in Shropshire of the 56,000 who lost access to NHS dentistry when the previous Government reneged on fee agreements with NHS dentists? Will those people have their access to NHS dentistry restored in future years?

Mr. Milburn: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's support. I assure him that we shall continue to do everything that we can to improve access to NHS dentistry in Shropshire and the rest of the country. I can report that, so far, we have approved 140 investing-in-dentistry projects, giving extra access to NHS dental care to 250,000 patients who would not otherwise have had it. We are doing that by offering the NHS dentist a grant in exchange for continuing to treat NHS patients. In other words, this Government are bringing back into the health service dentists whom the previous Government drove out.

Hospitals (Clinical Performance)

3. Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown): What action he is taking to improve patients' access to information about local hospitals' clinical performance. [46603]

15. Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): What action he is taking to improve patients' access to information about local hospitals' clinical performance. [46615]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): We want to develop a system that will provide general practitioners and their patients with access to fair and accurate indications of clinical performance in their local hospitals. As a first step, we shall publish later this year a number of hospital-based clinical indicators on deaths and complications covering a range of operations.

Dr. Turner: Is not the public availability of meaningful information on clinical outcomes an absolute prerequisite for achieving the universally high standards of clinical performance that the Government want? Moreover, had we had such data in the public purview before now, we might have detected sooner such unfortunate occurrences as the poor surgical performance on babies in Bristol or the appalling record of hip replacements. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the data can be of vital help in transforming the health service?

Mr. Dobson: It is certainly our wish that the various arrangements that we are making to set quality standards and make sure that they are met will avoid awful occurrences such as the deaths of babies who had heart operations in Bristol, the cervical cancer screening failures in Kent and Canterbury and the breast cancer screening failures in Devon and Exeter. To do that, it will be necessary for the people who are conducting the operations and the hospital management to have data available to them, and we believe that it should be made available also to local general practitioners and patients.

Fiona Mactaggart: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on using the opportunity of the 50th anniversary of the NHS to end the cloak of professional secrecy that has kept patients in the dark about the results of treatments. However, I urge him to think carefully about how he presents the information. There are areas of clinical practice where information is publicly available—for example, for in vitro fertilisation and other fertility treatments. Those tables can be misleading because clinics that use the most adventurous treatments or treat older women seem to have less successful results than those that use basic treatments, treat conservatively or treat young women. I urge my right hon. Friend, in publishing this information—which I welcome enormously—to think about the quality of information to patients, so that they can understand it as well as possible.

Mr. Dobson: It is certainly the case that we are trying to make sure that any information that is published commands the support of the professionals involved. As I said in my first answer, that means making sure that the information is both fair and accurate.

I have said in the House before, and I will say again, that Great Ormond Street hospital for sick children is in my constituency. The surgeons there frequently perform extremely difficult and complex operations on children who have already undergone operations in other hospitals. Sadly, the children often die, despite the efforts of the doctors, nurses and other staff at Great Ormond Street.

We certainly need to have in place a system that reflects the complexity of operations and the state of health of the patients. I am determined to have statistics that properly reflect all the circumstances; without them, no one, least of all the patients who would otherwise be misled, will benefit.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): Is not one of the most useful techniques to determine clinical excellence Health Services Accreditation? Can the Secretary of State assure me that its disposal will be carried out to the highest possible standards, that no undue influence will be exerted on such disposals, and that those involved in the process who may have a conflict of interest will be invited to withdraw and fall silent?

Mr. Dobson: The process of accreditation of a group of doctors or an institution necessarily involves judgments by other doctors. There is no way people without the necessary professional expertise can judge other people's professional expertise. From time to time, there may appear to be conflicts of interest because of connections within the medical and other professions. We shall try to avoid that—but we cannot get away from the fact that the only people capable of judging professional competence are other members of the same profession. We do need outside influence, but in the end there is no point in getting someone who is not a liver transplant expert to judge the skill of another liver transplant expert.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): Does the Secretary of State accept that the inquiry into the Bristol scandal may find that the problem was not to do with the publication of data but rather to do with the failure to act on data known to the professionals? Given the way that the media may report such data, is there not a danger of repeating the second-generation pill scare? Information wrongly portrayed in that case led to greater inefficiency, poorer health, and a greater number of unwanted pregnancies and abortions.

Finally, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that there may be an increased use of palliation instead of operations; and that clinical judgments may be distorted in an attempt by surgeons to avoid appearing low down league tables when dealing with difficult, possibly terminal cases?

Mr. Dobson: I am not quite sure from that whether the Liberal party is for or against the publication of this information. I thought that I had made it clear that we want the statistics published to show the nature and complexity of the operations and the general state of health of the patients. As far as I know, that commands the support of the representatives of the medical, nursing and midwifery professions; providing that we act in this way, none of the problems to which the hon. Gentleman refers should arise. Meanwhile, someone in the Liberal party needs to make it clear whether it believes in keeping the information secret or making it public.

Teenage Smoking

4. Mrs. Sylvia Heal (Halesowen and Rowley Regis): What initiatives he is bringing forward to reduce the incidence of teenage smoking. [46604]

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): The Government's strategy on smoking, including plans to reduce smoking among young people, will be set out in detail in the tobacco control White Paper to be published later this year.

Mrs. Heal: Does my hon. Friend agree that, if we are to protect our children and young people from the dangers of smoking, we must try a variety of methods, including controlling access to cigarettes and a ban on tobacco advertising? I hope that she will join me in congratulating Sandwell health authority and trading standards officers, who have carried out a number of visits to traders to advise them of their obligations. They have also attempted some test purchases which, in some cases, have resulted in prosecutions and fines.

I am sure that my hon. Friend is also aware of the report that ASH—Action on Smoking and Health—published last week, exposing the activities of members of the tobacco industry who target children. One of the bosses, speaking of teenagers, said, "They got lips, we want them." Is it not shameful that the only contribution of the Conservative party has been to block a ban on tobacco advertising?

Ms Jowell: Yes, it is shameful; and yes, I am delighted to join my hon. Friend in commending the efforts of authorities such as Sandwell that are seeking to protect young people from the effects of tobacco. The figures speak for themselves: there are 160,000 more regular smokers among children between the ages of 11 and 15 than there were 10 years ago. Children smoke the most regularly advertised brands of cigarettes. At current rates, smoking will kill about 1 million of today's children in their middle years. That is why it was so important that the UK Government acted, where the previous Government had failed to act, to secure a European Union-wide ban on the advertising and promotion of tobacco last week.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): Does the Minister believe that the incidence of teenage smoking will be reduced by the publication by her Department—at public expense—of a glossy magazine about health targets, which contains no fewer than 32 photographs of herself? What is the justification for that extraordinary publication? Does she hope that it will distract youngsters from poster sites, or does she see herself as a ministerial nicotine patch?

I speak as a non-smoker who also believes in choice. Given that there is little or no evidence to suggest that teenagers are tempted to smoke by adverts, even if they are keen on racing cars, will the Minister accept that discipline by parents and schools, and education about the harmful effects of that self-polluting habit, are what is required? What is her budget for such health education, and how will she concentrate it on the young?

Ms Jowell: Yes, I agree that health education is important, and yes, I agree that parental dissuasion from smoking is also important, but it is absolutely clear that the rate at which young people smoke will not decrease unless we ban tobacco advertising. The Conservative party, when in government, steadfastly stood in the way of protecting children's health, by blocking the European ban on tobacco advertising.

Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): Does the Minister agree that, if we are to tackle the scourge of the increase in teenage smoking, we must give young people good role models, not only to educate them on the harmful effects of cigarette smoking, but to present to them the fact that it is uncool to smoke? Unfortunately, many young people see cigarettes as a fashion accessory. Unless we tackle that aspect in our health education literature and promotions, we shall find it very difficult to reduce the incidence of teenage smoking.

Ms Jowell: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. He has drawn attention to another reason why the Government must lead on a range of strategies in order to reduce smoking among children—but it is our intention to reduce smoking among children, and we shall deliver on it.

Finished Consultant Episodes

5. Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): How many patients were treated by the NHS in each of the last five years; and what was the average waiting time for hospital treatment. [46605]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): Approximately 8 million, 8.6 million, 9 million, 9.3 million followed by a record 9.5 million finished consultant episodes in 1997-98. The average waiting time for admission was 45 days in 1995-96, the latest year for which figures are currently available.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for those figures, which demonstrate the success, over 50 years of the NHS, of constantly treating more patients. I am sure that he would wish to congratulate the NHS on that—and to congratulate the Conservative party on having been in charge of the NHS for 35 of those years. However, I wonder whether he would agree that, as we try to increase the number of people going through the NHS and to shorten waiting lists, one of the most important objectives should be to reduce waiting times. Can he pledge to the House that when—if—he ever shortens waiting lists, he will also have started to reduce waiting times?

Mr. Milburn: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that we have already started to reduce waiting times. For the first time since records began, there are no people waiting 18 months or more for treatment. We shall continue to make progress on that. The hon. Gentleman and his party should grasp the point that, as we reduce waiting lists, we shall reduce waiting times. With regard to his party's custody of the national health service, I remind the hon. Gentleman that his party opposed the creation of the NHS.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is it not important to have a national health service? Arising from what my hon. Friend has just said, and in view of the 50th anniversary of the NHS this Sunday, would it not be appropriate for the Tory Opposition, especially Front-Bench Members, to apologise to the country for the fact that their party did all that it could, in Parliament and outside, to stop the national health service coming into being? Would it not be a sign of humility if the new health spokesperson for the Conservative Opposition made that apology today?

Mr. Milburn: That is a matter for the right hon. Lady.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): Now that it appears from press briefings that Ministers have accepted that, if more patients are to be treated more quickly and better, significantly more money is needed for the health service—there is apparently to be an announcement about that—and that a proper inspectorate is needed to ensure decent quality—there is apparently to be an announcement about that, too—will there also be an announcement that we are to have a more democratic health service at the end of the Government's period in office? Will we have representatives accountable to the public taking regional strategic decisions, and patients and ordinary people taking local health decisions? Are we to have a professionals-run health service, or a people's health service?

Mr. Milburn: We shall not have direct elections to NHS boards, if that is what the hon. Gentleman is asking, but I give him this assurance. We have had the national health service for 50 years, and its achievements have been immense. I am sure that everyone in the House would want to pay tribute to all the work that all the staff have done for all that time. However, the NHS has never done a very simple thing: we have never asked patients what they want from the national health service, and what they think about the local services that the NHS delivers. We shall do that for the first time this year. There will be the first annual national survey of patients. It will happen later this year, next year and every year thereafter. It will enable us to give patients a hand in decision-making in the NHS.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South–East): Is it not the case that the national health service is owed a colossal sum of money, some of it by those indulging in private practice? If that money had been collected in 1996 alone, is it not true that we should not have been left with the mess of long waiting lists?

Mr. Milburn: As my hon. Friend knows, last year this Government directed the NHS to do what it should always have done: to make first use of NHS capacity, before considering referring to the private sector.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I join in the praise of the national health service but, with reference to waiting time, will the Minister give us an assurance that the time taken by the general practitioner to get in touch with the consultant will be taken into account? There is a tendency to ignore that, and some patients are waiting far too long to see a consultant.

Mr. Milburn: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. Patients are sick of waiting for GP appointments and out-patients appointments. They are sick of waiting to get into hospital, and some even have to wait to get out of hospital. That is why the Government are pledged to get waiting lists down. As we get waiting lists down, we shall get waiting times down as well.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): Is my hon. Friend aware of the enormous success of the James Paget hospital, which serves my constituency, which has reduced waiting lists by 375 patients in the months from January to May this year? Following the increase in resources that the hospital has received from the Government, it expects to have reduced waiting lists by March 1999 to 225 below the figure for March 1997. Is that not proof that, in my constituency, the pledge is being honoured?

Mr. Milburn: I thank my hon. Friend, and I should be grateful if he would pass on Ministers' thanks for the enormous efforts that are being made in his local hospital. We want to see that achievement replicated everywhere. We are confident that that will occur and that, by March next year, waiting lists will be lower than the record level that we inherited in May last year.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Does the Minister accept that, when the NHS was established 50 years ago, it drew heavily on the egalitarian principles that were the background to the service in Wales? Those principles enshrined the idea that people should have access to health care in line with their needs and not their ability to pay. Given that those are the principles of the national health service, will the Minister assure the House today that it is Government policy that every person who needs a life-saving, life-enhancing or pain-reducing treatment will get it as quickly on the NHS as by going privately? If that cannot happen now, when will it be achieved?

Mr. Milburn: That is precisely what we want to see for the national health service. The Government were elected on a manifesto pledge that the national health service will be there for patients when they need it. Need and not people's ability to pay or who their general practitioner is should be the factor that determines how health care will be made available to individual patients.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): When Opposition Members talk about their custody of the national health service, does my hon. Friend agree that it is worth reminding them that, when they left office, waiting lists were at a record high and rising? Will my hon. Friend expand on his previous comments about the need for a comprehensive health service? An insidious element of the previous Government was that treatment depended on who one's general practitioner was rather than clinical need. Does my hon. Friend agree that clinical need should be the sole criterion for NHS treatment?

Mr. Milburn: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: the Conservatives' record on waiting lists and waiting times is far from happy. During their 18-year tenure of office, 400,000 people were added to the waiting list. The previous Government never managed to achieve what we shall achieve in office: getting waiting lists down not just this year but next year and in subsequent years. We shall achieve that goal and, when we do, I hope that Opposition Members will praise us.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): I am sure that we shall. Do not the elderly—not just in Worthing but throughout the country—wait the longest for treatment? Emergency services are usually utilised by young people while the elderly need cataract, hip and heart treatments and the like. Does the Minister agree that resources matter in large part? When does he expect that his Government will see a real increase in resources each year that matches the average for the 18 years in which the Conservatives cared for the health service?

Mr. Milburn: Shortly.

National Institute for Clinical Excellence

6. Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): To what extent health authorities will be able to disregard the guidelines issued by the proposed national institute for clinical excellence. [46606]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): We shall be consulting shortly on our proposals for the national institute for clinical excellence. We intend that its guidance will apply to all health authorities. We do not expect that any health authorities or individual clinicians will disregard advice from the national institute, but they will need to take account of local circumstances and the needs of individual patients when implementing guidance.

Mr. Webb: I am grateful to the Minister for that response. I tabled the question because some of my constituents who would benefit from using beta interferon to treat multiple sclerosis cannot receive that treatment because they live in Avon. However, if they lived in Somerset, they could receive that treatment. Some of my constituents have paid privately for the treatment and are benefiting from its use. Will the Minister give a cast-iron assurance that the national institute for clinical excellence will introduce a guideline, stating that this drug works and is effective, that will be followed uniformly across the country?

Mr. Milburn: I am aware of those concerns and of the particular problems experienced in Avon. Department of Health officials have examined carefully Avon health authority's policy on beta interferon. It is fair to say that we have the worst of all worlds at present: too many unproven treatments are introduced into the national health service too quickly while too many proven treatments, on both cost and clinical grounds, are introduced too slowly. The consequence is a lottery of care. The national institute and national service frameworks are about guaranteeing fair access to treatment throughout the country. I hope that, when we publish our proposals shortly, the hon. Gentleman will welcome them.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Does my hon. Friend agree that clinical excellence is at the heart of a good-quality NHS, and should not we be wary this week of being carried away? We have a good NHS, but it could be a darn sight better. For 35 years, it let many people down because the Tories were running it. Many people have been let down by the NHS, and it is our duty to look forward to the next 10, 20 and 50 years. We must ensure first, that the Tories never get their hands on it again and secondly, that we make it as good for every British citizen as it possibly can be.

Mr. Milburn: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The best in the NHS is still the envy of the world. We may not have the best football team in the world—time will tell about that—and we certainly do not have the best cricket team in the world, but we do have the best health care system in the world. We should not talk down the prospects of the NHS. We want it to continue to expand and thrive, and to guarantee excellence and high standards everywhere.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): The Conservative party welcomes the pursuit of clinical excellence, but the Secretary of State has said that the function of the national institute for clinical excellence will be to give a strong lead on clinical and cost effectiveness. Is it not inevitable that NICE will become part of the rationing mechanism, ruling out the use of certain drugs, treatments and procedures within the NHS? What assurance can the Minister give that, combined with cash limits on general practitioners' prescription budgets, NICE will not place intolerable restrictions on clinical freedom?

Mr. Milburn: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his first formal appearance at health questions. I assure him that NICE is not a national council for rationing, and I remind him that it was the previous Conservative Government who introduced cash-limited budgets for GPs.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): When the House looks back at the NHS in 50 years' time, does my hon. Friend think that one of the causes of celebration will be that the Government challenged the two main causes of waste and inefficiency in the NHS now—the faith in the omnipotence of the individual clinician and the fact that so many decisions are taken for reasons of commercial profit? Will the Government redouble their efforts to ensure that we break away from so much of the mythology-based medicine from which we suffer now and go on to science-based and evidence-based medicine?

Mr. Milburn: I think that the NHS wants evidence-based medicine. I do not think that there has been a time in the past 50 years when the clinical professionals, who, after all, deliver the quality of care that we all want to see for our constituents, have been so geared to improving standards. The Government want a partnership to be forged between the Department of Health and the clinical professionals—in particular, their leaders—to ensure that standards are as high as possible everywhere inside the NHS, and that effectiveness is the driving force for treating patients.

Private Medical Insurance

7. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): What assessment his Department has made of the impact of the ending of tax relief on private medical insurance premiums for the over–60s on the current size of hospital waiting lists. [46607]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Paul Boateng): No formal assessment has been made, but we expect that any additional demand will be small in comparison with the substantial additional resources that we are making available to the NHS.

Mr. Swayne: It is too early for reliable statistics, but the anecdotal evidence, certainly from my constituents, is that the Government's short-sighted action will have a significant and detrimental impact on waiting lists. Can the Minister rise above dogma for a moment and acknowledge that co-operation with the private sector might just be part of the solution to long waiting lists?

Mr. Boateng: Fifty years on and Conservative Members still have not learnt; they put the interests of private medicine before a national health service free for all at the point of use. When we come to look at the use to which the £140 million that we saved from abolishing that tax relief is put, we shall see that cutting VAT for elderly people's heating bills did more for the health of the elderly than private medicine ever did.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): Is it not a fact that those who queue jump by going private lengthen the queue for everyone else? In the 50th year of the NHS, would not the most appropriate tribute to Nye Bevan be to deal with his unfinished business and get rid of private medicine for the NHS, once and for all?

Mr. Boateng: Each and every person must make a decision in relation to private medical insurance. We are concerned to improve the NHS for all the people, putting the interests of the many before the few—that is the Labour way.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle): Is it not worth recording that Nye Bevan, whom I greatly liked and admired, not only did not try to get rid of private medicine, but, when he became seriously ill, had all his treatment in private hospitals?

Mr. Boateng: Conservative Members fought against Aneurin Bevan and everything that he stood for. On every occasion, Conservative Members voted against the creation of the NHS. They cannot be trusted with it—we can.

NHS Management Costs

8. Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): What targets he has set for reduction in NHS management costs by 2002. [46608]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): Our White Paper, "The new NHS", sets out a programme of action to release £1 billion from bureaucracy over five years. By the end of this year, £240 million that, under the Tories, would have been spent on bureaucracy, will have been released for patient care, which is what the people of this country want.

Ms Stuart: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in the first year of the Labour Government, my health authority, Birmingham, received an extra £201,000 to improve breast cancer treatment, and £219,000 to improve intensive care for children? Can he confirm that that money was available not least because of his decision to halt the eighth wave of GP fundholding? Can I have some reassurance that the Labour Government's commitment to primary health groups will not introduce a new bureaucracy, but will be part of a continued commitment to fund money into patient care, not into bureaucracy?

Mr. Dobson: It is certainly the case that primary care groups will reduce the amount of money spent on the paperwork of transactions between primary care and hospitals, and that the previous Government had earmarked £20 million to be spent simply on the paperwork of the eighth wave of fundholding. We stopped that, and £10 million went to better breast cancer services and £5 million to improving children's intensive care. I am sure that, apart from a few witless loons on the Conservative Benches, everyone in the country thinks that that is right.

Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): While the Secretary of State remains concerned about targets, he will be aware that hospitals up and down the country face closure. In my constituency, we have three community hospitals: Burford faces the certainty of closure, Witney faces the closure of 25 per cent. of its beds, and Chipping Norton will lose beds too, yet all have an occupancy rate of more than 90 per cent. The hon. Gentleman knows that Oxfordshire community health council has decided to refer to him the absurd proposals for closures and bed cutting that have been put forward by the community health trust because of his failure to supply enough money. Will he guarantee the people of west Oxfordshire that he will save Burford hospital from closure, and save the beds that are due to close at Witney hospital?

Mr. Dobson: I cannot offer any such guarantees at the Dispatch Box. As Conservative Members who still have fading memories of being in government may recall, it is proper for me to comment in detail on proposals that come before me only after I have considered all the detailed information. Otherwise, any decision that I made could be challenged in the courts. The Government have put £2 billion extra into the NHS, over and above what the Tories had put into the budget for last year and this year—£2 billion more than they had intended to spend, and £1 billion more than the Liberal Democrats promised to spend.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): What scrutiny is my right hon. Friend giving to the pioneering effort across Morecambe Bay acute health trusts and Morecambe Bay community health trust in order to develop services across a wide area, and to cut the ludicrous bureaucratic costs inflicted on us by the previous Government? While I am on my foot, will he commend the sterling work of the accident and emergency department at the Royal Lancaster infirmary and look into giving the nurses more pay?

Mr. Dobson: I pay tribute to all the work that is being done in the Morecambe bay area. By amalgamating four trusts, we are saving a huge amount in bureaucratic costs. That money will now be better spent on patient care, which is what people in the Morecambe bay area want.

Drugs Budgets

9. Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): What plans he has to ensure that capping drugs budgets in primary care groups does not give rise to rationing by GPs. [46609]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): No individual element of the unified budget will be artificially capped. Health authorities and their primary care groups will continue to develop a range of measures to encourage general practitioners to use cost-effective and rational prescribing. As now, no one will be denied the drugs that they need. That is a guarantee.

Dr. Tonge: I am a little disturbed that, on two occasions in the Chamber this afternoon—the first was the response to my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb)—the Minister has suggested that institutes of clinical excellence should set priorities. He is now asking GPs in health authorities to set priorities within their identified budgets. All that I can say is that we heard it in the House first, rather than from the newspapers. This health team is now actively considering setting priorities, or introducing rationing, into the health service.

Is the Minister happy with his total cave-in to the British Medical Association, in that primary health care trust boards will consist of seven GPs, one nurse, one social worker and one lay member? Does not that breach the national health service's standing orders on professional representation? How on earth does the Minister think that he will get seven GPs in the same room agreeing with one another at the same time?

Mr. Milburn: GPs have already been doing that in recent years, and they will continue to do it. The local medical committees conference voted overwhelmingly for it. We have now given GPs and nurses more power and leverage than they have ever had before in the national health service. I am surprised that the hon. Lady does not welcome that.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): The Minister will know that he replied to me in a written answer about the licensing and prescription of the drug Viagra. May I convey to him today the concerns of GPs in my constituency, who have asked me to draw to his attention the fact that if the new drug, for which no provision is currently made in the drugs budgets, is made available under NHS prescription, it should be available on clinical need only through hospitals, not through GP practices? GPs are very concerned about their drugs' budgets.

Mr. Milburn: Yes.

Hospital Waiting Lists

10. Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): When he expects there to be a downturn in hospital waiting lists; and if he will make a statement. [46610]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): The evidence is that today, as we are speaking, hospital waiting lists are coming down. Early indications from the NHS executive show that waiting lists stopped rising in May and have been coming down in June: the supertanker has turned. I am confident that that will be confirmed when the validated figures are published in August. The Government intend to ensure that the waiting lists keep coming down.

Mr. Skinner: That is wonderful news, especially as it was not even a planted question—I showed great perception when I tabled the question a fortnight ago. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, as a testament to the health service that we have been discussing in the past 45 minutes, we should ensure that, having built it, we now rebuild it for the next century after the destruction caused during the past 18 Tory years? That will need a lot more money, and my right hon. Friend has asked for more money in the past from the Chancellor of the Exchequer and from the Prime Minister. We shall need at least £12 billion between now and the next general election to ensure that the promises that we made last time will be carried out, and that the Tories will be sent packing.

Mr. Dobson: I am sure that no one would have dared suggest that my hon. Friend had tabled a planted question. If I may say so without embarrassing him, I cannot think of anyone for whom I would rather have provided that reply. I shall bear his point in mind. When we compare ourselves with the people who founded the national health service 50 years ago, we should remember that they founded it on an act of faith. They hoped it would work; we know it works.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald): We congratulate the national health service, which is why the Opposition Front-Bench team are proud to wear their badges. That view does not seem to be shared by the Secretary of State or the Minister of State. May I invite the Secretary of State to ask his hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to congratulate the previous Conservative Government, who built the Bolsover community hospital, which I assume his constituents use, and the nearby Chesterfield and North Derbyshire Royal hospital, which is a large, successful hospital that his constituents also use? We built those hospitals.

May I turn to the right hon. Gentleman's rather hopeful answer, although he did admit that it was not based on any firm statistics? Have not the Government merely taken the first step towards getting the lists down to the level they inherited from us and away from their own record levels? Waiting lists are not coming down; under this Government, they have been going up to record levels, and the Government admit that it will take them half a Parliament just to get them down to the levels that we left them with.

Mr. Dobson: The right hon. Lady may expect my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to congratulate the Tory Government, but probably the only thing he would congratulate them on is being so useless that they lost the last election by the biggest landslide in the 20th century. The right hon. Lady would like the waiting lists to continue to rise, because that would be to the political advantage of the Tory party, but they are coming down.

Miss Widdecombe: The right hon. Gentleman has not entirely answered my question. Is this not just the first predicted, not even guaranteed, step towards getting waiting lists down to the level at which we left them? Will he also please tell us how the waiting lists for the waiting lists are doing? Why is he refusing to publish information about waiting times for out-patient appointments as requested by my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond)? Will he tell us about rationing, which has meant that four minor operations are no longer available anywhere in the country on the national health service? Is that also a means of getting waiting lists down?

When he has answered my questions—I say this in great hope, because it is more likely that his hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) would congratulate us than it is that the Secretary of State would answer a question—will he guarantee that at this moment, no other area in the NHS is suffering as a result of his concentration on the failed delivery of his early pledge?

Mr. Dobson: I do not know how the right hon. Lady understands the concept of movement. If waiting lists were rising and are now coming down, I think it fairly obvious that that constitutes a first step—like, perhaps, the first step taken by the people who used to escape from prison when the right hon. Lady was Minister with responsibility for prisons.

Any journey has to begin with a first step, and this is that first step. I am not pretending that it is the second step, or the third step; but I am promising that there will be more steps, and that they will mean that waiting lists come down.

Miss Widdecombe: May I have the answers to my questions about the waiting lists for waiting lists, the waiting times for out-patient appointments, rationing whereby minor operations are no longer available and the fact that other parts of the NHS are suffering as a result of concentration? May I have those answers, please?

Mr. Dobson: We publish exactly the same information as was published by the last Government throughout the 18 years during which they were in office. They did not publish information about the length of time for which people were waiting for out-patient appointments, and we have not started to do so, although it is possible we shall.

If the right hon. Lady believes that certain people are being denied operations to which they are clinically entitled, will she give me the details? I will then follow up the information, and ensure that the people concerned have those operations. Will the right hon. Lady do that, instead of just making cheapskate remarks over the Dispatch Box?

Drug Misuse Services

11. Helen Jones (Warrington, North): What assessment has been made by his Department of the extent of the link between money invested in drug misuse treatment and money saved from the cost of crime. [46611]

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): The benefits of treatment, and the reduction of crime as a result, have been clearly established by the national treatment outcome research study. It concluded that for every £1 spent on drug treatment, £3 of the costs of crime was saved. Prevention is a key part of the Government's strategy to tackle drug abuse and protect communities from its awful consequences.

Helen Jones: I thank my hon. Friend for her reply. Is she aware of the very different views on the link between crime and drug misuse held by the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), who, in his book "Saturn's Children", called for the legalisation of the distribution and consumption of hard drugs? What would be her Department's response should the shadow Health Minister call for the legalisation of crack, smack and Ecstasy?

Ms Jowell: My hon. Friend raises an important question. We know that the views of the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) were set out very fully in the first edition of his book, but the House is entitled to know also whether, since he has changed the chapter concerned and given an undertaking to the leader of his party, he has also changed his mind about these matters.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): If the Minister has any questions about the Opposition's policy on the drugs strategy, she ought to ask me. My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) follows my policy.

Is the Minister aware of research undertaken in America, which shows that money spent on drug detoxification and rehabilitation programmes provides excellent value? What new money is the Department providing for such programmes in order to bring down the waiting lists and waiting times that are growing day by day?

Ms Jowell: The hon. Lady has come to the rescue of the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton, who stayed in his seat rather than answer questions from the Front Bench.

The hon. Lady is right: detoxification can be a highly effective part of getting people off drugs. We are determined to invest in treatments that are effective, and announcements about spending on treatments for drugs will be made in the course of the comprehensive spending review that is due shortly.

Breast Cancer Treatment

12. Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): What steps he is taking to improve access to breast cancer treatment. [46612]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Paul Boateng): We have made £10 million available for breast cancer services, which is being used to support more than 300 initiatives throughout the country. Particular emphasis has been given to supporting projects that give rapid access to diagnostic services.

Our White Paper sets out a specific target that everyone with suspected cancer will be able to see a specialist within two weeks of urgent referral. That has been guaranteed for breast cancer by April 1999.

Mr. Martlew: I thank the Minister for that and the £140,000 that has been put into Cumbria since October. The Minister may be aware that we have a local difficulty in Carlisle—people who are picked up on the screening system cannot be treated at the Cumberland infirmary. If he is not aware of that, later this week, I will be giving him a 14,000-name petition on the matter, collected by the women of Carlisle.

It would be unfair for the Minister to respond to that matter today because an expert panel is looking into it, but can we look at the scheme nationally and locally? It is for women aged between 50 and 65. There is much concern among women who are over 65 and outside the scheme. When I talk to medical experts and doctors, they say that there is no medical reason for their exclusion. Will the Minister review that policy and, in the meantime, will he give an assurance to those women over 65 that, if they wish to continue to be screened, they will be accommodated by the NHS?

Mr. Boateng: I can give that assurance. We have a number of pilot projects that are looking specifically at the issue of automatic call-back for screening for women over 65, and we will consider the results of those pilot projects in due course. The national programme co-ordinator is, I understand, giving advice to interested parties in his constituency about the screening service for women in Cumbria and I welcome my hon. Friend's interest in and concern about that matter.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I know that you will be aware that very many questions have been tabled to the Foreign Secretary and other Ministers on the involvement of Sandline International in the supply of arms to Sierra Leone. Ministers have refused to answer those questions on the ground that they came within the scope of the Legg inquiry, which they have said they do not wish to prejudge.

This morning, the Foreign Secretary wrote to the Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee a letter that contains the following two sentences:

"There was no ministerial conspiracy to breach the arms embargo. There was no connivance within Whitehall to breach the arms embargo."

Those assertions not so much prejudge as entirely pre-empt questions that lie at the heart of the Legg inquiry. Will you now give an indication of your views, in the light of the Foreign Secretary's letter, on the propriety of Ministers refusing to answer questions in the way I have identified?

Madam Speaker: As the right hon. and learned Gentleman will appreciate, it is not for me to comment on answers to questions that are given by Ministers. I must also make it clear that, unless a matter is reported to me by the Chairman of a Select Committee, I do not propose to alter the long-standing practice of not commenting from the Chair on the proceedings of Select Committees. The matter must be reported to me in the first place by a Chairman of a Committee before I make any statement or any comment about it.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am most grateful to you. Can you give me some guidance? It was obvious to me that the Secretary of State for Health was not aware that the NHS organisation Health Services Accreditation was being disposed of. There are concerns about the process of that disposal. Can you give me some guidance on how he could come to the Chamber and publicly give me some advice on the disposal of Health Services Accreditation?

Madam Speaker: I think that the hon. Lady is attempting to prolong health questions. Perhaps she might care to table a further question to the Secretary of State for Health, or refer the matter to his attention by means of an early-day motion.

Unsolicited Facsimile Messages

3.34 pm

Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prohibit the sending of facsimile messages offering for sale goods or services or seeking answers by questionnaire without prior permission of the recipient.

Increasing numbers of people find it convenient to have a fax telephone machine at home. Almost without exception, small businesses use a fax machine to conduct their day-to-day business in what they expect to be a cost-effective and convenient manner.

Home users and businesses alike are being plagued by unwanted facsimile messages which use up paper, tie up telephone lines and arrive at all hours of the day and night. I have had many letters from my constituents and from colleagues whose constituents are receiving such facsimiles, asking how to put a stop to this invasion of their privacy. They are dismayed to learn that the solution, if it works, may cost them yet more money.

Fax marketing has increased hugely in recent months. Organisations have been carrying out automatic number searches in order to identify fax numbers and compile lists. The Office of Telecommunications—Oftel—is taking action against those who have adopted that practice, but vast lists already exist which include many ex-directory residential numbers. Those lists are clearly being used extensively.

Constituents have provided me with examples of goods and services that they have been offered. They are numerous and come in many forms. They cover everything from supplies of a recently identified wonder drug, world cup tickets, miracle diets and discount air fares to how to win the national lottery or buck the stock market, from debt collection services to questionnaires on this country's future in Europe and the registration of paedophiles, and highly distasteful joke faxes.

I have also received complaints from constituents about unsolicited telephone calls and junk mail and about the growing problem of junk e-mails, but I have chosen to deal today only with the nuisance of unsolicited facsimile messages rather than with all distance-selling practices, and I do so for several reasons. Most important, unlike junk mail or telephone calls, an unsolicited fax involves a cost to the recipient by way of paper, toner or ribbon and electricity. Junk faxes are expensive to receive. However irritating, junk mail and telephone calls cost the recipient nothing.

Junk messages tend to be sent in the middle of the night and wake the domestic user who has a phone by the bed. Unsolicited telephone selling usually takes place during the day or early evening and, though inconvenient, is less intrusive. The receipt of a lengthy fax ties up telephone lines, causing inconvenience and irritation, especially when long messages of a business nature are sent to domestic users or to a small business that needs access to what may be a limited number of telephone lines.

The content of some messages is of an undesirable or offensive nature—not something I should wish young people or children to see. Junk mail can be thrown away intact with its contents never read.

At the moment, we have an opt-out regime for marketing faxes. The fax preference service, established by the Direct Marketing Association, has reduced the number of unsolicited residential faxes received, but it remains legal for a company to send a fax to a registered number against the wishes of the recipient. Many constituents who are registered with the fax preference service continue to receive messages. They see that as adding insult to injury. The service is, of course, aimed at home users rather than business users. A business can register under the scheme, but there is no obligation for marketing companies to cross-check and remove such numbers from their lists.

As the House will know, the Telecommunications Act 1984 requires anyone running a telecommunications system in the United Kingdom to do so under licence. Companies using fax marketing are subject to a class of licence that contains measures aimed at limiting the nuisance caused by unsolicited calls by requiring callers to cease making such calls on receipt of a written request from the recipient. Oftel can then be requested to intervene in order to enforce the rules if the company continues to transmit messages. In serious cases, a licence can be revoked.

Unsolicited facsimile messages that promote premium-rate telephone services are also governed by a code of practice issued by ICSTIS, the Independent Committee for the Supervision of Standards of Telephone Information Services.

ICSTIS tells me that it has become apparent that many customer complaints about unsolicited faxes relate to those promoting premium-rate numbers, and that, over the past year or so, such complaints have risen sharply. Examples of the type of messages generating a complaint to ICSTIS are similar to those that I have already cited, and include faxes soliciting information to compile business information directories; fax-back questionnaires; and faxes promoting other so-called joke faxes.

ICSTIS continues to take action against companies whose services breach its code, which sets standards on content, and has recently banned one company whose series of joke faxes were deemed to be offensive and inappropriate.

Before the proliferation of fax marketing, the combined approach that I have outlined—enforced by Oftel and ICSTIS—may well have offered adequate protection to my constituents and others. However, I now share my constituents' view that that approach is unsatisfactory. The quantity and content of messages coming into our homes and businesses make them a genuine concern. They represent the thin end of the wedge. If we do not act now to address a relatively simple issue and so draw a line in the sand, how can we expect to regulate as information technology moves forward and access to the internet and e-mail become as commonplace as we all expect them to do?

The current regulation system is no longer adequate. Numerous companies are sending unsolicited faxes, and each company must individually receive a letter requesting that it desist from doing so. Marketing companies make it clear that unstamped post will be returned, so the cost of each envelope and postage has to be borne by each recipient. It is possible to calculate the cost of receiving one fax and requesting the sender to remove a number from its list. However, it adds up to a significant sum when that cost is multiplied several times to cover the cost of all the faxes received in one week. Only last week, one of my constituents received seven such faxes.

The European Union distance selling directive and telecommunications data protection directive—which go some way to dealing with the problem of unwanted fax messages—are in the process of being adopted. However, they will leave it to member states to choose between a prior consent regime and an opt-out regime. The Government have not announced how they will proceed on the issue.

We must not allow our constituents to continue to be pestered. Unsolicited faxes are costing them sleep and considerable sums, and are causing immense frustration and annoyance. The solution could be very simple—the onus must be placed on the person sending the fax and not on the one receiving it. We will overcome some of the problems that I have described by requiring a company or individual wishing to transmit multiple advertising faxes or fax-back questionnaires first to seek prior consent from the proposed recipient.

Such a Bill will, of course, need careful and detailed drafting to avoid unnecessary bureaucracy. My Bill may make the process cumbersome and expensive for marketing companies, although marketing companies may think that that price is worth paying. Most important, my Bill would restore control of fax machines to their users. I urge the House to support it.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Christopher Fraser, Mr. David Atkinson, Mrs. Angela Browning, Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown, Mr. James Gray, Mr. Dominic Grieve, Mrs. Eleanor Laing, Dr. Julian Lewis, Mr. Owen Paterson, Mr. David Ruffley, Mr. Desmond Swayne and Mr. Robert Walter.

UNSOLICITED FACSIMILE MESSAGES

Mr. Christopher Fraser accordingly presented a Bill to prohibit the sending of facsimile messages offering for sale goods or services or seeking answers by questionnaire without prior permission of the recipient: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 3 July, and to be printed [Bill 215].

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.44 pm

The Paymaster General (Mr. Geoffrey Robinson): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The clause makes two changes to the scope of the relief from stamp duty reserve tax, known as SDRT, when there is an exchange of shares held in a depositary receipt scheme or a clearance service. SDRT on share transfers is usually charged at 0.5 per cent., but the rate is 1.5 per cent. when United Kingdom shares are issued or transferred into a depositary receipt scheme. The higher rate is a kind of season ticket charge. It reflects the fact that transfers of depositary receipts within the scheme will not be liable to the tax. There are similar rules for clearance services.

There is a relief from the 1.5 per cent. charge when there is an exchange of shares in a takeover or merger. For example, when company X takes over company Y, there is no 1.5 per cent. charge on the shares that company X issues into the depositary receipt scheme in exchange for the existing shares in company Y. Normally, 1.5 per cent. tax will already have been paid when the existing shares in company Y entered into the scheme in the first place. The aim of the relief is to prevent a second 1.5 per cent. charge from being levied merely because new shares are being issued in exchange for the existing ones.

The new clause deals with two points. First, the Inland Revenue has received legal advice that the relief works more narrowly than the way in which it has been applied because, in this context, the meaning of exchange is confined to cases where company X issues shares to company Y shareholders in exchange for the existing company Y shares. In practice, there are also cases where the existing company Y shares are cancelled and new company Y shares are issued to company X in return for the issue of new shares in company X to company Y shareholders. Until the receipt of the legal advice, such cases were also considered to be within the scope of the relief. The new clause will enable them to continue to qualify for relief.

Secondly, the new clause will restrict the relief in certain cases where it may be available, but is not justified because there is no double charge to be relieved. In such cases, no 1.5 per cent. charge has been paid on the existing shares in the target company Y because they were outside the scope of the charge. A particular example is where company Y is a foreign company because the 1.5 per cent. charge applies only to shares in UK companies. Under the new provision, the issue of new shares will qualify for relief only if the existing shares in the target company Y are chargeable securities within the scope of the 1.5 per cent. charge.

I hope that hon. Members will agree that the new clause makes desirable changes to the current rules, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): In general, the House should disapprove of the Government introducing provisions at an extremely late stage to remedy deficiencies in legislation, especially as they have had more than a year to address such problems and correct them. The House is being invited to accept a new clause to the Finance Bill, which is not only being presented at a late stage, but requires a ways and means resolution; it is a most unusual procedure which should be reserved for special circumstances.

We have no quarrel with the substance of the new clause, as it is a relieving measure aimed at correcting a deficiency. Our complaint is that the Government looked closely at stamp duty when they were drawing up the Budget. We know that, because they used it as one of their back-door tax-raising measures. Stamp duty was increased by £500 million a year. That will be the total burden on businesses and householders when the provisions take full effect. The Chancellor, quite misleadingly, suggested in his Budget speech that the burden would be borne entirely by rich householders, when 75 per cent. of it will be borne by the corporate sector.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Does my right hon. Friend agree that irritation at the Government's hurried presentation of the new clause is compounded by the fact that the Paymaster General has not thought it proper to give the House any assurance that none of his own business interests is affected either way by the proposed new clause?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We must await an assurance from the Paymaster General that his many interests have been properly declared. The stamp duty provisions will bear down heavily on the corporate sector. My hon. Friend would like to know whether that will affect the Paymaster General's business interests.

The Conservatives want to protect the interests of corporate Britain, which is suffering grievously from a succession of tax rises. That is why investment is due to fall next year and the year after, according to the Government's figures, and why unemployment could start to rise. The last thing that business wanted or expected was a heavy burden from a dramatic 50 per cent. increase in the upper rate of stamp duty.

It is a pity that the Government did not take sufficient trouble to spot the problems that they are creating with their tax policies. The Financial Secretary wrote to alert me to the new clause, but the letter is dated only yesterday. It is most regrettable that we have to digest, comment on and scrutinise complicated measures with only a day's notice, when the Government have had many months to prepare their Budget and the Bill.

When did the Inland Revenue receive the legal advice? Could the matter not have been dealt with in a more timely fashion to give the House a better opportunity to scrutinise the provision?

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): Part of the new clause extends the relief, to ensure that it operates as intended. As the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) said, that is welcome. However, the Government have taken the opportunity of reacting to the legal advice to introduce a restriction on the relief that will affect some mergers in which one company is foreign, as the Paymaster General said. The restriction will have little effect on Exchequer revenues, but it will damage the corporate sector by affecting tax calculations for mergers and will result in the holding company relating to some mergers being located outside the United Kingdom. At the moment, the tax incentive is for the holding company to be in the UK.

We benefit from having such holding companies in this country. They bring extra tax to the Exchequer, they employ people and there are spin-off benefits. Any measure that restricts the incentive to locate in the UK must have significant and overriding grounds for being introduced. The Paymaster General did not make that case when introducing the new clause. I hope that he will come up with some stronger arguments when he replies.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: The problem emerged just before the Budget. We received the legal judgment only very recently. This is a relieving measure which companies and industry clearly want. We have done well to respond so quickly. In seeking the co-operation of the Opposition to facilitate the measure, we are acting in the best interests of British companies.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) raised a separate point. I think that he is probably referring to the correspondence between Mr. George Ritchie of Deloitte and Touche, and my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary. We have acknowledged that there could be a problem, particularly with a UK company acquiring a United States one. Many other factors are taken into account in such situations—not just tax, but the tremendous advantages for holding companies in the UK. Those advantages have been considerably enhanced following the abolition of advance corporation tax, and there has been a problem with foreign income dividend streams. Billiton—a massive South African group—chose the UK, on balance, for those reasons. It was a reasoned correspondence with Mr. Ritchie.

The measure has been introduced not purely on financial grounds, but on the principled basis that the tax should be paid, but not double paid—we are making that specific relief. There must be a compelling reason for the tax not to be paid. We will keep the situation under review and see what develops.

New clause 14

FIRST-YEAR ALLOWANCES FOR INVESTMENT IN NORTHERN IRELAND

'.—(1) In section 22 of the Capital Allowances Act 1990 (first-year allowances), after subsection (3C) there shall be inserted the following subsections—

"(3CA) Subject to the provisions of this Part, this section applies to—

(a) any expenditure incurred in the special relief period by a small company or a small business on the provision of machinery or plant for use primarily in Northern Ireland; and

(b) any additional VAT liability incurred in respect of expenditure to which this section applies by virtue of paragraph (a) above.

(3CB) For the purposes of subsection (3CA) above expenditure is incurred in the special relief period if, disregarding any effect of section 83(2) on the time at which it is to be treated as incurred, it is incurred in the period beginning with 12th May 1998 and ending with 11th May 2002.

(3CC) Expenditure is not expenditure to which this section applies by virtue of subsection (3CA) above in so far as it is—

(a) expenditure to which Chapter IVA applies; or

(b) expenditure on the provision of an aircraft or hovercraft."

(2) After subsection (6C) of that section there shall be inserted the following subsections—

"(6D) Expenditure incurred on the provision of machinery or plant shall not be taken to be expenditure to which this section applies by virtue of subsection (3CA) above if—

(a) at the time when the expenditure is incurred, the person incurring it intends the machinery or plant to be used partly outside Northern Ireland; and

(b) the main benefit, or one of the main benefits, which could reasonably be expected to arise from the relevant arrangements is the obtaining of a first-year allowance, or a greater first-year allowance, in respect of the part of the expenditure that is attributable to the intended outside use.

(6E) In subsection (6D) above—

(a) 'the relevant arrangements' means the transaction under which the expenditure is incurred and any scheme or arrangements of which that transaction forms part;

(b) 'the intended outside use' means so much of the use of the machinery or plant as (at the time mentioned in paragraph (a) of that subsection) the person intends will be use outside Northern Ireland; and

(c) the reference to the part of the expenditure that is attributable to that use is a reference to so much of the expenditure in question as is so attributable on a just and reasonable basis."

(3) In subsection (10) of that section after "this section–" there shall be inserted—

"'hovercraft' has the same meaning as in the Hovercraft Act 1968."

(4) After section 22A of that Act there shall be inserted the following section—

"Withdrawal of first year allowance on change of use

22B.—(1) Where (but for this section) section 22 would apply to any expenditure by virtue of subsection (3CA) of that section, that section shall be deemed never to have so applied to that expenditure if, at any relevant time—

(a) the primary use to which the machinery or plant is put is a use outside Northern Ireland; or

(b) the machinery or plant is held for use otherwise than primarily in Northern Ireland.

(2) In subsection (1) above 'a relevant time', in relation to any expenditure, means a time which—

(a) falls in the period of two years beginning with the date of the incurring of that expenditure; and

(b) is a time when the machinery or plant belongs to the person who incurred the expenditure or to a person who (within the terms of section 839 of the principal Act) is, or at any time in that period has been, connected with the person who incurred the expenditure.

(3) All such assessments and adjustments of assessments shall be made as may be necessary in consequence of this section.

(4) Where a person who has made a return becomes aware that anything contained in that return has, after the making of the return, become incorrect by reason of the operation of this section, he shall, within three months of first becoming so aware, give notice to an officer of the Board of the amendments that are necessitated in his return in the light of the matter of which he has become aware."

(5) In the second column of the Table in section 98 of the Taxes Management Act 1970 (penalties in respect of certain information provisions), in the entry relating to provisions of the Capital Allowances Act 1990, after "Sections" there shall be inserted "22B(4),".

(6) Subject to subsection (7) below, the preceding provisions of this section have effect in relation to every chargeable period ending on or after 12th May 1998.

(7) No claim for an allowance falling to be made by virtue of subsection (1) above may be made at any time before such date as the Treasury may by order appoint; and where the period for making any such claim would (but for this subsection) have expired before the end of the period of twelve months beginning with that date, it shall expire, instead, at the end of that period of twelve months.'.—[Mr. Geoffrey Robinson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following Government new clause 15—First-year allowances: consequential amendments etc.

Government amendments Nos. 25 to 28.

Mr. Robinson: The new clause is part of a package of measures announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on 12 May aimed at creating a new framework of prosperity in Northern Ireland. That package included a varied range of measures covering areas such as employment, transport, education, housing, agriculture, tourism and innovation, as well as this special measure to assist small and medium-sized businesses.

Under the clause, during the four years starting from 12 May this year, expenditure on machinery or plant incurred by a small or medium-sized business for use in Northern Ireland will be eligible for a 100 per cent. first-year capital allowance. In other words, such expenditure may be written off for tax purposes in full straight away. That extra help to speed up investment for the rest of this Parliament represents a £100 million cash flow boost to smaller business in Northern Ireland.

As the House knows, some 99 per cent. of businesses in Northern Ireland are small and medium-sized businesses, including many in the tourism and service industry sectors. The new first-year allowances will therefore be available to a large number and wide range of businesses across Northern Ireland. I commend the new clause to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 15

FIRST-YEAR ALLOWANCES; CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS ETC.

'.—(1) In each of subsections (4), (6B) and (6C) of section 22 of the Capital Allowances Act 1990 (first-year allowances), for "subsection (3C)" there shall be substituted "one or more of subsections (3C), (3CA) and (3D)".

(2) In section 22A of that Act (expenditure of a small company or small business)—

(a) in subsection (4), for the words "parent company", wherever they occur, there shall be substituted "parent undertaking"; and

(b) in subsection (6), for "'parent company'" there shall be substituted "'parent undertaking'".

(5) In sections 44(5), 46(8) and 48(7) of that Act (which also contain provisions relating to the temporary first-year allowances under section 22(3B) and (3C) of that Act), for the words "or (3C)", in each place where they occur, there shall be substituted ", (3C), (3CA) or (3D)".

New clause 1

REPAYMENT OF DIVIDEND TAX CREDIT TO NON-TAXPAYERS

'.—Section 30(5)(b) of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1997 shall cease to have effect.'.—[Mr. Fallon.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 1 is an attempt to put right an injustice that was raised in Committee. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) and to Age Concern, who have highlighted the issue. Very simply, before the abolition of dividend tax credits, non-taxpayers could claim back the tax credits up to 20 per cent. of the dividends that they received. From next April, they cannot.

These are, perhaps, relatively small amounts of money, but they are extremely significant for non-taxpayers who are pensioners. They may be pensioners on very low fixed incomes of £4,000 or £5,000 a year who now stand to lose £100, £200 or £400—sums of that order. It is just dawning on those pensioners exactly what injustice they face.

Miss Geraldine Deery, from St. James road, Sevenoaks, came to see me at my surgery and pointed out that she is 76, has no occupational pension and is entirely dependent—apart from the state pension—on dividends from the investments that were made from the savings she had made from her salary. Next April, she stands to lose between £150 and £160 a year. After coming to see me, she wrote to me and said:

"This may seem peanuts to Mr. Robinson but it pays, for example, for my one short annual holiday which is all I can afford after paying everyday household bills."

Mrs. Pendleton has also written to me, pointing out that the change does not affect the amount of tax paid by taxpayers. Anybody who has an income sufficient to pay tax will not, under this change, have to pay more tax. The only people to suffer under the change are pensioners who are too impoverished to pay tax at all. That seems a double injustice.

To be fair to the Paymaster General, when we raised the issue in Committee, he recognised the problem and undertook to pursue a solution. He was spurred on in that not only by my hon. Friends but by the hon. Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston), who was also rightly concerned about the particular problem of pensioners on very low incomes and the injustice that they will face next April. I understand that, through the good offices of the Paymaster General, the matter was further considered last week. I hope that he will be able to report to the House, as he undertook to do, on the progress that he has made.

It may be that the change was rushed through the House and was an inadvertent consequence of the speed with which last July's Finance Bill was considered, but no Member should be in any doubt about the consequences. Next April, around 300,000 pensioners, who, in the financial year 1995-96 claimed on average £75—in many cases, the sum was higher or lower—will lose that entire amount. In your constituency, Madam Speaker, about 400 pensioners will be affected. The change will affect about 400 pensioners in each constituency. They will soon be asking why that change was made and who authorised it. It is late in our deliberations on the Bill, but it is not too late for the Paymaster General to put right this injustice. In moving the new clause, we give him the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Edward Davey: I do not want to detain the House for too long because I know that many hon. Members want to speak on the new clause. I set out my views in Committee last July, and my party's views were reiterated by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) in Committee this May. I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) on the way in which he has pursued the matter and the hon. Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston), whose intervention in Committee was important in getting the Paymaster General to promise to reconsider the change.

We have come a long way since the Government's first Finance Bill last July, when the Economic Secretary had a much less flexible attitude to interventions by Liberal

[Mr. Edward Davey]

Democrat and Conservative Members on this issue. I am glad that the Paymaster General was present in Committee to hear our argument, which is one of social justice. It is patently absurd that non-taxpayer pensioners, who are, by definition, the poorest pensioners in our society, should be singled out by the Government for tax increases that, as we have heard, average £75, but in some cases will be significantly higher.

As we have heard from the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon), more than 300,000 pensioners will be affected, which is more than 400 in every constituency. This is a major issue, and it is right that the House should be debating it.

We should remember that pensioners may have received shares not because they have been long-term investors in the stock market, but because they were made redundant or inherited them. They may have had a little flutter and bought privatisation shares issued under the previous Government. These pensioners will have received their shares not because they are sophisticated investors but by dint of happenstance and good luck. The dividend income from those shares makes a huge difference to their incomes. The average amount received, £75 a year, equates to one week's pension.

The Government's arguments in favour of the change were rehearsed many times in Committee, but have not stood up to analysis. Their main argument is that pensioners will be protected when individual savings accounts come in towards the end of the century. We have argued strongly against that defence; it is very clear to us that the pensioners affected may be infirm and may have real worries about dealing with complicated financial affairs. They are unlikely to read the financial press or to follow the Chancellor's every move so as to know when to switch their savings to the new ISAs. When they wake up in two or three years' time to the fact that their dividend credits have not been given to them, they will realise just how badly they have been affected.

The House should stand up for these unsophisticated savers and say no to the Government's proposals. These people deserve defending.

Mr. Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): As the hon. Members for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) have mentioned, I raised this issue in Committee. I was especially concerned about the poorest pensioners—non-taxpaying pensioners—who might have received a small number of shares from employers or from a privatisation issue. The income from the shares gives them a small supplement to their basic pension.

Earlier this week, the Minister received a deputation comprising the hon. Members for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) and for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), two representatives from Age Concern and me. He gave us a sympathetic hearing and is fully aware of the problem. I realise that there may be technical reasons why my hon. Friend cannot accept the new clause today; I realise that there are difficulties with identifying the pensioners who will be worse off as a result of the changes. I should like the Minister to give the matter his closest attention even if he cannot announce any improvements today.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): The issue goes back to last July's Budget, which prevented non-taxpayers from reclaiming dividend tax credits from the Inland Revenue. The new clause would undo the damage done then.

There are in this country 630,000 non-taxpayers who claim back some form of tax credit on their share income every year. They include children. Of the 630,000, 300,000 are non-tax-paying pensioners who claim an average £75 a year. Of that 300,000, 80,000 claim more than £100 a year—and many thousands claim much more than that.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Although these sums are not significant to us, will my hon. Friend acknowledge that they certainly are significant to the elderly pensioners among our constituents—precisely the sort of people for whom the Labour party used to care?

Mr. Gibb: That is an important point. A non-taxpayer is, by definition, a person on a very low income. After the essential bills—rent, telephone, heat, food—have been paid, the residual income is even lower; so tax refunds on dividend income constitute a high proportion of such pensioners' disposable incomes. From April 1999, that will be removed from them.

The Exchequer will save about £50 million a year by the measure, but, even if it were to continue to allow people to reclaim their tax credit, the amount would be halved in April 1999 in any case, because the Finance (No. 2) Act 1997 reduced the tax credit from 20 to 10 per cent. As a result, even if the Government were to accept new clause 1, pensioners and other non-tax-paying individuals would suffer a halving of the tax credit on their dividends. Therefore, the cost to the Treasury of reversing this measure would be only about £25 million.

As it is, the Government are continuing the policy of tax-back, where non-tax-paying individuals can reclaim income tax deducted on interest income in bank accounts when the bank or building society deducts the interest at source. If the Government are continuing that scheme, it seems odd that they are not allowing pensioners, and other non-tax-paying individuals who have shares, to reclaim the tax back on that income. Age Concern, which has vigorously supported this campaign, has said:

"Older people who have not had the opportunity to contribute to private pensions are particularly reliant on savings and investments. The loss of the tax credit will penalise them unfairly."

Every hon. Member has received considerable correspondence on the issue from constituents. I have had an especially large number of letters from constituents of other hon. Members throughout the country. One letter, from Mr. Geoffrey Pugh of Cheshire, was published in The Times at the beginning of June. He says that, between them, he and his wife have an income of less than £10,000. He continues:

"we own our house, drive a car, live modestly . . . we do not qualify for Government handouts, nor do we wish to. But the prospect of losing 20 per cent. of our modest investment income makes us wonder how we shall manage."

I have received many letters from my constituents. Mr. Caffyn, who lives in Pagham, just outside Bognor Regis, says:

"Apart from War Service, myself in the 8th Hussars, and my wife served as a Nurse, we have paid our taxes regularly through the media of PAYE, and to the National Pension fund . . . We have saved".

That is consistent with the statement by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) that it is not by luck that people have amassed a small share portfolio; they have saved hard. The letter continues:

"now it appears we are going to lose 20 per cent. (that we have been claiming back over the last few years.)

'Gobbler' Brown (as he is beginning to be known in this area) really should get himself organised, and not expect people in the no tax bracket to pay tax."

The Treasury has received many letters on the issue. A gentleman from Cornwall says:

"I have just received a payment from the Inland Revenue for £310 which under the new proposals would not be paid after April 99. I think this is grossly unfair when Standard rate taxpayers lose nothing."

A lady from South Wirral says:

"I am a 70 year old widow and have only my late husband's National Insurance contributions for my pension, so rely on my investment for income.

This year I reclaimed £213.56 tax credit and still my income was less than the personal allowance. There must be many more pensioners in the same position."

Many thousands of pensioners are in that position.

A gentleman from Keighley in West Yorkshire said:

"My wife aged 77 has received a small repayment of tax credit on her limited investments as she is a non-tax payer. Her retirement pension as a married woman is £38.70 per week . . . Last year she received a repayment of tax credits in the region of £250. As her annual pension amounts to only £2,012.40 this sum of £250 is a very welcome addition.

I am 81 years of age and the shares held by us jointly are the result of steps to save for our old age."

No luck in their share portfolio; they have worked hard for it, they have sacrificed and they have saved.

A lady in Nuneaton in Warwickshire wrote to me

- "As a 'non taxpaying pensioner' partly dependent upon share dividends I really am disgusted at this proposal".

A lady in Harrogate in West Yorkshire says:

"My own income, together with interest from investments and savings, amounts to the total 1997/98 allowance of £5,400 . . . I have beenable to reclaim £473" on a dividend tax credit. The lady continues:

"The interest on Investments and Savings are the result of careful planning, modest living standards, and wise investments, and represents a 'private pension' built up over many years.

I am appalled to think that the Government is prepared to penalise senior citizens to this extent when we ourselves have done everything possible to protect ourselves from the demands old age can bring."

A gentleman in Ruislip in Middlesex writes:

"The wife and I stand to lose £500. When almost every day we read of certain spendings of tax on wallpaper, tables and a certain gentleman that forgets a £200,000 fee."

I have no idea what the last point refers to.

A lady from Solihull in the west midlands states:

"As a 67 year old . . . I have a mentally ill son of 44, and when I knew how severely ill he was and would never be able to work I set out to try and put a small nestegg away for him for his later years, and I stayed at work for an extra five years just because of it.

As a consequence he has about £120 a year tax refund, which I use to replace things like shoes and clothing."

A gentleman in Dudley in the west midlands writes:

"I am 78 years old and a war veteran . . . Thirty years ago I started to invest in Unit Trusts and later in Equities. Although I never earned a large wage I managed to build up a modest investment."

That gentleman will now lose £622 as a result of the measure.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): Will my hon. Friend confirm that, in addition to that penalisation, when the full measure is in operation in 2004 people who do not pay income tax will also not benefit under the new ISA arrangement? The Bill was supposed to make it more tax attractive for low-income groups to save, but it makes saving less attractive on two counts—by ending tax credits and by not replacing them with an ISA scheme from which those groups will benefit.

4.15 pm

Mr. Gibb: My hon. Friend makes a good point. When justifying the measure in Committee, the Government said that ISAs were the vehicle that such people could use, once the dividend tax credit repayment was abolished. However, for basic rate taxpayers, low rate taxpayers or non-taxpayers, there is no advantage in holding equities through an ISA. Low and basic rate taxpayers generally do not pay capital gains tax anyway, because they are unlikely to use up the annual capital gains allowance. The 20 per cent. tax credit reduced to 10 per cent. and repaid only until the year 2004, as we have heard, is hardly likely even to cover the charges. After 2004, even that small benefit from holding equities in an ISA will be abolished.

I shall mention two more people briefly. A gentleman in Burwood in Dorset states:

"In the case of my wife and self the total amount which we shall be unable to reclaim is £886 per annum. As our combined annual income is approximately £11,500, this new ruling is catastrophic to us."

A couple in Dorset say:

"The reason we are non-Tax payers is because we are pensioners and on a low income (hence the Non-Tax payers).

The thought of losing the ability to reclaim Tax Credits has really upset us . . . Last year the total reclaim between the two of us only amounted to £118.16p, but even this small amount makes a big difference to us, we use it to help the payment of bills."

That is a small sample of the correspondence that I have received, and an even smaller sample of the correspondence that I know the Paymaster General and other members of the Treasury team have received. I should have thought that that would prompt the Government into taking action before now.

The only response from the Inland Revenue is a callous letter, which states:

"It would have been anomalous to allow individuals to continue to claim payment of tax credits when such tax credits are being removed from all other investors."

The anomaly is that basic rate taxpayers, lower rate taxpayers and higher rate taxpayers will all benefit from the dividend tax credit, but the only people who will not benefit from it are those who do not pay tax. For some reason, the Government—inadvertently, incompetently or deliberately—have decided that non-taxpayers should pay tax on their dividends, whereas every other section of society should not.

[Mr. Gibb]

We went to see the Paymaster General last week. I am grateful to him for sparing the time to meet us. Both in Committee and at the meeting, he raised the difficulty over sovereign immunity—the fact that non-UK residents who have sovereign immunity would be able to continue to reclaim the tax credit.

I am surprised that the Government cannot find a way around this technical problem. The Revenue is full of technical specialists who I am sure could find a way of dealing with that loss of revenue. Despite the fact that the Government have not tabled an amendment, I hope that the Paymaster General will give an absolute commitment—with no dilutions and no caveat attached—that the Government will move an amendment to the next Finance Bill to reverse this measure. It will take effect in April 1999, which means that tax reclaims will begin to be submitted to the Revenue after April 2000 in the run-up to the general election. The political imperatives are there and, if the Government were to give such a commitment now, it would set at rest the minds of many hundreds of thousands of non-tax-paying individuals, who could be secure in the knowledge that they will continue to be able to reclaim important income from their dividend tax credits.

Ms Helen Southworth (Warrington, South): The Government are already taking serious action to ensure that poor pensioners receive the help that they need. We recognise that that assistance is very important. My experience before coming to the House showed quite clearly that there are far too many poor pensioners in Britain, and that their number increased under the previous Government.

We have taken action to reduce value added tax on fuel and have given every pensioner household winter fuel payments. I was privileged to contribute recently to policy that reduces VAT on insulation for poor pensioners. We are looking urgently at ways of reaching the 1 million pensioners on low incomes who are not claiming the benefits to which they are entitled and that they should be receiving.

I have spoken to Ministers about this issue. I understand that there are complexities involved in identifying individual pensioners on low incomes who are affected, but I ask my hon. Friend the Paymaster General to consider seriously taking action on this matter as soon as possible.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) and to Age Concern on raising public awareness of this issue. It will affect large numbers of relatively poor pensioners from next April, and many of them were not aware of it until the press coverage that accompanied my hon. Friend's campaign in Committee.

The Paymaster General was clearly rattled by the points that my hon. Friend raised in Committee and, assisted by the intervention of the hon. Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston), he gave us cause to hope that he would introduce a measure at this stage of the Bill's progress to ameliorate the impact on very poor pensioners. We are extremely disappointed that no Government amendment or new clause has been tabled to give effect to the implication of the Paymaster General's comments in Committee that he was sympathetic to our concerns.

As my hon. Friend said, many hon. Members on both sides of the House have received correspondence from pensioners who will be affected by the measure. That correspondence makes pretty heart-rending reading. In many cases, we are talking about people who stand to lose perhaps £200 or £300 a year. Those people view that money, which they have habitually reclaimed in the form of dividend credits, as the means of running a car or having a modest annual holiday. They are the small luxuries of life that those people will now have to forgo.

The fact that hundreds of thousands of people are prepared to fill in the relatively complex paperwork required to reclaim sums averaging only £75 a year is testimony to the importance that they attach to this money. Those sums may seem small to us—and even smaller to the Paymaster General—but they are clearly very significant to those who stand to lose them. It is clear from reading the correspondence that great confusion, concern and distress have been caused.

Even I, cynical as I may wish to be, cannot believe that it was the Government's intention openly to penalise the poorest, the non-tax-paying pensioners, by discriminating against them and putting them in a worse position than those paying standard rate or higher rates of income tax.

I was surprised that the Paymaster General did not take the opportunity to back down gracefully. In fact, the Government's reaction has been to dig in and, despite initially showing sympathy in Committee, the Government have given no ground at all.

In Committee, we heard that it is inconvenient and expensive for the Inland Revenue to process these many small claims, but I suggest that this is an example of the tax-collecting tail wagging the tax-paying dog. It is not good enough that this mean-minded measure should go through simply for the convenience of Inland Revenue officials.

Mr. Edward Davey: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Government drafted the Finance Act 1997 in such a way as to ensure that there was no increase in the tax burden of higher rate taxpayers as a result of the move? Does the hon. Gentleman wish to comment on that?

Mr. Hammond: The point that my hon. Friends and I would like to emphasise is that the measure discriminates against the poorest members of our society. In Committee, Labour Members, failing to understand the concerns raised by Conservative Members, attempted to paint this as some kind of fat-cats charter, but, by definition, the measure affects only those who are too poor to pay income tax. I cannot understand how a new Labour Government can believe that they are enhancing their political credentials by forcing through such a measure, creating 250,000 or so angry, disfranchised pensioners as a result of the loss of a vital chunk of income.

The measure is not simply mean-minded, but politically incompetent. The Government put up the Paymaster General, with all the baggage that he carries, to tell the poorest pensioners that they must give up, on average, £75 each for the convenience of the Inland Revenue and because it would be too tricky for the Government to find a way of allowing them that little extra bit of income without allowing foreign potentates, who benefit from sovereign immunity, to slip through a loophole.

In Committee, the Paymaster General raised our hopes when he appeared to be sympathetic to the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton. He has now dashed those hopes and, with them, the hopes of many hundreds of thousands of pensioners throughout Britain. It is not part of my brief to recommend to the Government ways to avoid alienating 250,000 voters, but the matter is far more important than narrow party political advantage and I urge the Government, even at this late stage, not to commit this ludicrous act of mean-minded political suicide in penalising the very people whom they claim to be helping and whom it is the function of all hon. Members to seek to protect.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): Considerable credit goes to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) and Age Concern for highlighting the matter, and I am happy again to pay tribute to both.

The impact of the abolition of dividend tax credits on nil taxpayers, the poorest and most vulnerable, marked one of the low points in the Finance (No. 2) Bill. I cannot understand whether officials briefed Ministers on the consequences. By any objective assessment, the poorest and most vulnerable should pay the least tax. It is just and equitable that non-taxpayers who hold shares are not brought into taxation by the denial of the ability to recover tax credits on the meagre dividends that are paid to them. Therefore, what possible reasons do the Government have for denying this relief?

During the debate in Committee on 14 May, the Paymaster General, who is, I believe, convinced of the argument for change, said that he would reconsider the matter which has been discussed in today's debate. Will he give the House an up-to-date account of exactly what the Government propose to overcome such a mean and unnecessary consequence of their advance corporation tax change? Is it not time to hear first hand exactly what measures they will take to relieve this unjust and unfair consequence?

4.30 pm

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): This morning, I received in the post yet another letter from a constituent on this subject. We have heard from my hon. Friends how postbags have been deluged with correspondence from constituents who are only now waking up to the implications of the measure. Along with every hon. Member, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) on his sterling work on the new clause, without wishing to make his head swell even more than it has already.

A constituent in Worthing listened to "Money Box" on Radio 4 only a few weeks ago. He heard:

> "They said that the people most affected would be those on low incomes who had perhaps inherited shares. This applies to me and to my disabled sister—both of us inherited shares from our father."

My constituent and his sister

> "feel very angry that the present Government who profess to help the not so well off, should bring about the exact opposite."

He went on to refer to a pamphlet that they received from Saga, which stated:

> "Tax changes punish the poor."

The letter could equally have been written by someone who had shares because of redundancy and had invested the payment in a small number of investments, or by any of the millions of people, many thousands of whom would have been of pensionable age, who bought a modest number of shares in the privatisations.

Mr. Swayne: There seems to be a received wisdom that people who hold shares as a means of saving are somehow financially sophisticated and able to take care of themselves. Does my hon. Friend acknowledge that many such people who have written to me, and who may have written to him, cottoned on to the change only as a consequence of the campaign that has been mounted by our hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb)? Such is their level of financial sophistication.

Mr. Loughton: To pour further praise on my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton, my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) is right. Our hon. Friend and Age Concern brought the matter to the attention of the media, which resulted in mass publicity in the newspapers and on the radio, and probably on satellite television as well.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his characteristic courtesy in giving way. I hope that he will understand if I momentarily turn from praise, justified though it is, to blame. Our hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton referred to a callous letter from the Inland Revenue, dated 11 February, which defended current Government policy. Although the Paymaster General is legitimately attacked on this matter, does my hon. Friend agree that the Financial Secretary should also be attacked on it? She is the Minister responsible for the Revenue: is it not about time that we were told whether she is in office or in power, and whether she is told what to do or whether she has the slightest influence on Government policy?

Mr. Loughton: My hon. Friend is right: the entire Treasury team should be ashamed of that act of callousness of the worst order. To put the record straight, I should point out that the article in Age Concern's magazine referring to the callousness of the measure contained a photograph of my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton with the word "callous" underneath it. Of course, that referred not to my hon. Friend, but to the culprits and perpetrators of the crime, who sit on the Labour Benches. It is worth putting the record straight, because we do not want his reputation blemished for the entirely pure and philanthropic measures that he promoted so ably.

May I return to my speech? As my hon. Friends have said, only now are people waking up to what has happened, yet the legislation was passed a year ago. Many of my hon. Friends who are here today and I were on the Finance Bill Standing Committee last year. They will remember that it was guillotined through in just five days, compared with the six and a half weeks of luxury indulgence which we have enjoyed this year. The Budget announced on 2 July passed into law by the end of July, so organisations such as Age Concern had no time to get their act together and make proper representations to help us publicise that highly damaging measure. The measure was rushed through with undue haste, and only now are the victims of that callous act waking up to the fact that in April 1999 they will be substantially less well off.

The measure affects more than 300,000 people of pensionable age earning less than £5,400. The cost to the Exchequer is relatively small—some £25 million to £30 million, perhaps a little more, next year. Thus it affects the poorest pensioners. I represent an area of Worthing with the highest number of pensioners in the entire country, so I feel particularly aggrieved that yet another blatant measure is discriminating against good pensioner folk. Few of the pensioners in my constituency live in comfortable luxury, and many make their way on little more than the basic pension. The poorest people are hit the hardest.

I am sorry that the Financial Secretary would not take an intervention when she spoke a moment ago. She was dangling yet another red herring—goodness knows, we have had so many during the stages of the Finance Bill—when she said that the Government were enabling more pensioners to take advantage of more benefits. Our proposal would be much better because it would enable pensioners to stand on their own two feet and support themselves from their own investments. They could take advantage of dividends and dividend tax credits which are rightfully theirs, rather than having to rely on the welfare state. They are entitled to do that, but, if more people can make preparations for their own retirement and stand on their own feet, that is to be encouraged. This measure takes away yet another leg of support. It is a shame that the Financial Secretary did not accept that point.

In Committee, we had an awful lot of red herrings from the Paymaster General. In replying to an amendment on this very subject, he started talking about individual savings accounts. If he is absolutely honest with himself, ISAs are of minimal, if any, attraction to that class of investor because none of them will get anywhere near the annual capital gains tax allowance. Moreover, ISAs hold few income attractions, if any, for those on low incomes. Even if there were any, they would all be gobbled up by costs. It was a real red herring—another desperate attempt to justify ISAs replacing a far better scheme. The Paymaster General should come clean on that.

As I said in Committee, one option open to pensioners, if they are sophisticated enough to take investment advice, is to switch into bonds that pay gross dividends or into bank or building society accounts that pay interest gross. However, why should we condemn pensioners to capital growth in those accounts when we know the much greater attractions of capital growth in the equity market? Why should they be condemned to a fairly pedestrian investment portfolio of fixed interest stocks or cash investments? Their choice will be limited if the new clause is not accepted.

We have all received many representations. I pay tribute to the bravery of the hon. Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston), who did not realise that he was fundamentally undermining the Government's stance at the time and did a wonderful U-turn with great aplomb to support the amendment in Committee.

At one point in Committee, we were greatly cheered. The Paymaster General said:

"Combined with the abolition of ACT, we have made a major improvement of the corporate taxation system. We are getting rid of the in-built bias towards paying dividends".

He did not get off to a very good start. He then said:

"I shall deal with ISAs."

That was such a red herring that it was ruled out of order, and I hope that he does not repeat that error when he replies to the debate. Then things started getting better. After we had impressed on him the merits of the amendments, he said:

"The calculations that were made by the Opposition Members and by my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North are pretty much correct."

Things were looking up. We thought, "Golly, will this be the first amendment that we get accepted by the Government?" He went on:

"Perhaps a case can be made for an overall limit on payable tax credits, which might be in the region that Age Concern described in its very good paper."

That sounded as though the Paymaster General and his team were on the verge of accepting that sensible, common-sense amendment to prevent discrimination against the poorest people in the investment community. But then it all went wrong. He said:

"I see at this critical moment that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary is invigilating."

At that point, the Chief Secretary, who alas is not present today, appeared, and all the promises evaporated. The guarantees were suddenly not guarantees, and the promises were no longer promises. He ended up by saying:

"I make no promises, other than to revert to the matter on Report."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 14 May 1998; c. 191-94.]

What an enormous anti-climax that was.

I hope that the Paymaster General, without the presence in the Chamber of the Chief Secretary—although the Whip is here on his behalf—will have the courage to accept this common-sense new clause, and will show that the Government are concerned about the poorest in our society. It is very late in the day, but the Government have tabled scores of amendments to their own legislation, so it would not hurt them to promise to redraft this new clause to make it acceptable.

I hope that we are given better reasons than those given by the hon. Member for Dudley, North, who said that the amendments were unacceptable for technical reasons. We deserve better than that, and the pensioner investment community demands better. If the Paymaster General is not prepared to accept the new clause, we demand a proper explanation of why the Government continue to hit the poorest hardest.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): For all the Government's failings, shortcomings, incompetence and insensitivity, for which I and many Opposition Members have berated them in the past year, I never expected that they would get into this mess. I hesitated before trying to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I expected the Paymaster General to pre-empt the debate by declaring that the Government had come up with a solution that would protect the interests of the poorest savers. The Government may feel that I have been unfairly critical of them, but even I gravely overestimated them.

It is clear that the Paymaster General has no intention of announcing that the Government will come up with a solution to this problem. It is a human problem, and, ultimately, that is what is important. The hon. Gentleman and the Financial Secretary have constituents, and I cannot believe that they have not seen the shine in the eyes of a poor pensioner who has received a cheque from the Inland Revenue for a small amount of money, which to some people on the Treasury Bench may be a derisory amount, but which to that pensioner is of enormous consequence.

Unless the Government change their mind or we succeed in defeating them on the new clause, the pleasure and happiness that very poor people derive from receiving such an exciting and unexpected bonus—they live on the margin and have only £100 or £200 in hand—will be replaced by tears. Labour Members will see those people in their surgeries, as we will in ours. No doubt they are more hard-hearted than we are and will be less moved when that happens, but happen it most certainly will.

I shall move from human appeals to the more rigorous analysis that we are used to when discussing fiscal matters. I ask for a little more rigour in the Government's analysis, too. When the Paymaster General replies to the debate, he should not use the three arguments that I understand he used in Committee, none of which will wash. First, he should not talk about the feasibility and desirability of relieving the poorest savers from the need to pay tax, because that would not be the effect of the new clause.

Unfortunately, such is the effect of the abolition of advance corporation tax and the dividend tax credit that everyone who holds shares in British companies, directly or indirectly, will now pay tax. The argument is about whether the poorest pensioners and savers should pay double tax. The rest of us, whether we hold shares directly or through institutions and pension funds, will now pay double tax. The companies of which we are shareholders will pay corporation tax, and we will be taxed on the distributed profits. The issue is not whether, by means of the new clause, we should relieve the poorest savers from paying tax; it is whether we should relieve them of the burden of paying double tax.

The second point that I hope the hon. Gentleman will not make is that, for technical reasons, it is impossible to accept the new clause or to devise an equivalent measure to relieve the poorest savers—who are so poor that their incomes do not reach the income tax threshold—from the need to pay double tax on dividends from their investments. That cannot be true, because the Government have already introduced such a measure giving charities precisely the relief that we want for the poorest pensioners and savers. It will not wash to argue that there is no effective means of providing such relief, because the Government have condemned themselves by protecting charities from the abolition of the dividend tax credit.

The third argument, which has already been effectively demolished by some of my hon. Friends, is that the poorest savers can switch into the Government's new individual savings account. That argument will not wash either. As my hon. Friends have already said, the small savers involved are most unlikely to be able to benefit from the capital gains tax provisions of ISAs, because their capital gains will probably not exceed the individual allowance in any one year.

The major benefit of ISAs is the relief from capital gains tax liability. ISAs are not a solution to the problem of paying tax on dividends, because people will have to pay a management fee, and other commissions and charges, for the privilege of having an ISA. People will have to pay a fee to the intermediary who holds the franchise and who sets up the ISA: that is what these tax-advantaged savings vehicles are all about.

For people who pay tax at the standard rate of 23 per cent. or at the higher marginal rate of 40 per cent., it may be sensible to pay the fees required to join an ISA and to shelter part of their portfolio. Let me make the arithmetic simple. Let us say that the average dividend yield of the equities in an ISA is 4 per cent., and that tax is being paid at a marginal rate of 23 per cent. Roughly one of those four percentage points will be lost in tax. Someone who joins an ISA will probably pay 1 per cent. of the value of the fund by way of a management fee. In other words, what that person is not paying to the Revenue he will be paying to the financial intermediary who set up the ISA.

Opposition Members, at least, are concerned with the interests of poor savers. I am extremely sorry that that concern is not shared by Labour Members—apart from the hon. Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston), to whom I pay tribute for his individuality and courage. By definition, poor savers are not currently paying tax. For them, the choice will be between paying a tax that they do not currently pay—and, in my view, ought not to pay—and paying the same amount to an intermediary for the privilege of putting their shares into an ISA. Either way, they lose, and whether the Revenue or the manager of the ISA gains is a somewhat academic question for them. As I said earlier, an apparently small financial loss may be disproportionately grave in terms of the sum of such people's happiness.

I hope that we shall hear none of those three arguments this afternoon. I hope that we can now concentrate on whether it is fair, and economically sensible, to penalise the poorest savers—those who may begin to save modest amounts from the lowest incomes—by imposing a double taxation regime on them. That is what the new clause is about. If the Government reject it—notwithstanding all the unpleasant, cruel and callous things that they have done so far, and the many more that they will no doubt do in future—their action will be written high up on their tombstone. It will remain in the minds of the electorate—not just those on the lowest incomes who will be directly affected, but all in our country who believe that taxation should be fair and just, and that those with the lowest incomes should be expected to pay proportionately the lowest share of the country's collective tax costs.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): I cannot do better than say how much I agree with what I have just heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies). It was a typically eloquent and impressive exposition of the arguments, referring to all the key points, including those which I hope we shall not hear later from the Paymaster General—who, I must say, has looked rather bored during our proceedings so far. He has looked at his watch no fewer than three times, and has sat with his arms folded in a rather uninterested manner for most of the debate.

Let me begin by praising my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb), who is a neighbour of mine down in West Sussex and who first alerted me to this issue. Had he not done so, I would not have twigged—at least, not for a long time—that this change was in the Finance Bill. It was, of course, hidden away. It is a hidden consequence of the decision to make a grab on pension funds. The Labour party, which pushed the measure through at the time of the last Budget, had not thought it through at all. Many aspects of the legislation have had to be repaired: the sticking plaster has had to come out, and the Government have had to make emergency adjustments so that it looks right.

I have wondered why that is, and I think that the resignation of Sir Terry Burns gives us at least a bit of the answer. Sir Terry Burns is one of the best and most senior advisers in the Treasury. I would not mind betting that the policy on the pensions grab was thought out when Labour was in opposition, and was foisted on the Treasury without its having the opportunity to think it through carefully. That is why all the unintended consequences are now coming out of the woodwork—consequences that need to be dealt with.

I hope that Treasury Ministers will now begin to learn that it really does help to use the official machine rather than trying to bypass it. The press reports stating that the Chancellor works without properly consulting his official advisers, using an inner coterie instead, appear to have some credibility when we consider the effects of legislation such as this.

What exactly are those unintended consequences? My hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton spelled them out very eloquently. They are very bad news for non-taxpayers, the people whom Labour purports to want to help most. We know that Labour does not help taxpayers, but we now also know that it does not want to help non-taxpayers either.

As I understand it, non-taxpayers used to be able to claim tax credits on dividend income, but they will soon be unable to do so. There are 300,000 people over 65 in that category—some are my constituents—and they will be deeply angered by the change. One of them came to see me about it before I understood the issue. Until he sat down and described it to me, I did not have a clue what it was about: I had not grasped the significance of the change. Several more people have written to me expressing their concern.

Incidentally, when I write to the Paymaster General, I rarely receive answers to my letters inside two to three months. He is not listening now, as is so often the case when people try to make points to him. I have a whole batch of letters—

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend may be interested to know that some members of the Standing Committee are still waiting for letters that the Paymaster General promised to write to them during the Committee stage.

Mr. Tyrie: That does not surprise me at all. I am flabbergasted by the time it takes to get a reply from the Paymaster General on this or any other issue.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton pointed out, the average amount involved may seem small—£75, although it may be appreciably more in some instances—but it is a significant sum for non-taxpayers, to whom such small amounts matter a great deal. That is why Age Concern, among other organisations, has decided to make such an issue of the change. We have heard at least one quotation from an Age Concern document this afternoon. Age Concern is right to be worried, because the poor will be hit hardest. As I understand it, taxpayers will continue to obtain the benefit of the tax credit, but non-taxpayers will not. That will be the fundamental anomaly and injustice in the legislation, unless the Government make a last-minute decision to find a way out of this hole.

At present, the vast majority of those who will be affected—two thirds of a million altogether, including 300,000 pensioners—do not know about the measure. They have no reason to know, and no way of finding out whether the change will happen. They do not follow the Finance Bill. I am sure that those who drafted the Bill did not know about it at the time. How, then, can those people be expected to know? The time will come, however, when they will know, and they will resent it very much.

I said that the change was unintended. That may be a charitable view, but it is probably accurate. I gave an explanation of why it was unintended: Treasury Ministers do not listen to their own officials, although I think they are beginning to listen to them a little more than they did when they first arrived. Some of their best officials pushed off immediately; others waited a year out of politeness.

This afternoon, we shall find out whether this is an unintended measure that the Government want to put right, or a measure for which they should henceforth be squarely blamed. If they refuse to accept the new clause, we will know that this is something that they intend and want to do. They will have had ample time to reverse it and to think through what to do. They will be judged on the decision that they take.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Is my hon. Friend aware that anyone earning up to the new personal allowance threshold of £4,195, or just £80 a week, will be hit by this measure, which will thus affect some of the poorest in the land? Does he not think that that is highly reprehensible?

Mr. Tyrie: I did not know the exact numbers. I do find it highly reprehensible. I find it highly reprehensible, too, that Treasury Ministers are not even bothering to listen to the points that are being made to them.

If Treasury Ministers ignore and sweep away the new clause, we—and hundreds of thousands of people throughout the land—will know that it was their intention effectively to reduce the income of some of the poorest people, including pensioners.

5 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: There has been a good deal of cross-party support on this matter. I think that that was evidenced at the meeting that I was pleased to have with Age Concern, with the hon. Members for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) and for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb), and with my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston). I think that they made a powerful case. I think that the case in the country, and the feelings that have been conveyed, are considerable. I am sympathetic to that case. I have listened hard to it, but hon. Members will obviously be aware that we have not tabled a new clause at this stage and that, from our point of view, the matter is still under review. I am taking a deep personal interest in it.

Most hon. Members have made pretty much the same points during this debate as were made in Committee. I do not think there are any new points that particularly require addressing by me. As always, I welcome the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) to our debates. I am pleased that he is not deterred by his new onerous responsibilities from attending them. He is always a welcome figure.

Some points were quite irrelevant. The hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) made some remarks regarding some senior civil servants leaving early and others leaving now. Nothing could be further from the truth. We work extreme closely with civil servants. All the policies are worked out with civil servants in the Treasury, in Customs and Excise and at the Inland Revenue itself, so the hon. Gentleman need not worry about that. There is plenty of contact, and I am happy to have such good relations with the most senior and the most junior officials in the Department.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The hon. Gentleman is trying to muffle my fire by throwing up a smokescreen of compliments in my direction; in all honesty, that will not work. May I ask him to address the specific point about charities? If it is possible to devise a solution to protect charities, why is it so technically difficult to devise a solution to protect the poorest savers?

Mr. Robinson: That is a fair point. We have had good responses from the charities for what we did there, which was, as the hon. Gentleman knows, unprecedentedly generous: when the Conservatives removed tax credits, they gave a much shorter period. With regard to pensioners and non-taxpayers, the matter is more complicated. I say this to Conservative Members, including the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton, who has led the campaign from the Opposition Benches: it will not be issues of sovereign immunity that will stop us doing this. It is not a question of the convenience of the Inland Revenue. There are certain things that we are looking at. We are looking at alternatives, as we did when we went into the consultation period following the initial ending of tax credits, and deciding which way to go on company taxation policy overall with regard to ACT.

I can give no commitment today and I have not brought a solution to the House; we would not be having this sort of debate if I had. I am aware also of the growing anxiety among poorer non-taxpayers who have been hit by the measure, so I know that we need to make our position utterly clear as quickly as possible. I am working to that end.

Mr. Fallon: May I reply to the debate and thank all those who have participated? I think almost everyone who has spoken has shown some sympathy with the new clause. I am particularly grateful for the support from the Liberal Democrat Benches. My hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb), with the eloquence and precision that we have come to expect of him, made the case again: in this matter, he is the pensioners' champion. My hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) pointed out that the sums involved make a difference to the quality of life for some of our poorest pensioners. I am grateful, too, for the support of my hon. Friends the Members for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton), for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) and for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie).

No one defended the Government's position on the new clause. The hon. Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston) gave us his usual cameo of the Paymaster General's learned junior and said that there was something defective about the new clause, but I think he has some sympathy with, and is perhaps a secret supporter of, the new clause.

Then we heard, most surprisingly of all, from the hon. Member for Warrington, South (Ms Southworth). I am told that she was a member of the Standing Committee and that she sat upstairs with us for six weeks. She was certainly silent for six weeks, yet now she suddenly appears in the House and tells us that she has had a word with the Paymaster General. That parliamentary effort seems to have exhausted her—she has now disappeared—but we wait to see what effect that will have. We shall be judging the effort that is put in by Labour Members on this matter.

To the Paymaster General, I would say, "We expected a bit more than that." He has had six weeks to correct this injustice and to come up with an amendment of his own. Yesterday, there were amendments on the Order Paper to help the casinos. Perhaps he is more interested in the casinos than in the lives of our poorest pensioners. He has had six weeks to draft an amendment. He has admitted tonight that drafting such an amendment is not impossible—that there may be technical difficulties, but that they can be overcome. Indeed, he has said that he has listened sympathetically and has the matter under review.

The Government brought about this injustice a year ago. They have had plenty of time to review it. This was slipshod, inadvertent drafting, for which the Financial Secretary was responsible a year ago. Little wonder that she was not put up to answer the debate, and that it was left up to the Paymaster General instead.

There are two choices before the House. We can—at one point I was considering doing this—give the Paymaster General the benefit of the doubt, as we have done quite a lot, on quite a number of matters, over the past few months, or we can place on record our opposition to one of the meanest tax increases of all. We could put a marker down now, while he works away on his amendment, to the effect that we are opposed to the measure on behalf of 300,000 of the poorest pensioners—people who have put something aside, who have not claimed benefit, who have saved for their old age and who now find a Labour Government are robbing them of sums of £75 or £100. It is right that we press the new clause, and I invite my hon. Friends to support it.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 5

SPECIAL REGARD TO TRADING PATTERNS OF THE RETAIL INDUSTRY

'.—After section 59DA of the Taxes Management Act 1970 (payment of corporation tax under self-assessment) there shall be inserted—

"59F In making any regulations under section 59E above, the Treasury shall have special regard to the trading patterns and profitability of the retailing industry".'.—[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 5 is an attempt to correct one of the main deficiencies in the Government's corporation tax system, specifically the payment method provided for in the Bill. However, so that I might describe fully the intention behind new clause 5, I hope that it will be in order if I explain to the House some of the problems and—in all fairness—what the Government have tried to achieve in changing the method of taxing companies.

In the past year, we have moved away from the imputation system of corporation tax, which has, for some years, been a familiar part of the taxation landscape. The system was a good one, as it avoided double taxation of profits—in the hands both of companies and of shareholders. However, the Government decided—I can appreciate at least in part their motive for doing so—to switch from that system, abolishing dividend tax credits, to a system of periodic payment of corporation tax.

Our quarrel with the Government is that they have used the change to introduce very large increases in effective taxation. We witnessed an example of such an increase last year, when the abolition of tax credits dealt an enormous blow to the pensions industry by instituting a £5 billion annual raid on pension funds.

Last year was a particularly stupid time to tax savings, as the Government were themselves becoming alarmed at inflationary pressures in the economy. Taxing savings rather than consumption was therefore the most short-sighted action. It was also in conflict with everything that the Government were saying about the need to build up a savings culture in the United Kingdom, to encourage people to provide for their own retirement and generally to increase self-reliance.

I think that the Government understood that the only realistic alternative to welfare dependency was private savings. However, as usual with the Government, there was a huge gap between Ministers' rhetoric and their action. By withdrawing dividend tax credits, they sent a clear message to those who save and have private pensions: "Do not bother to save. If you do, the Government will come along and change all the rules, and tax the very savings and pension funds that you have built up."

Withdrawing dividend tax credits was another short-sighted action, as an acknowledged strength of the United Kingdom is the fact that we have an enormous and successful private pensions industry. It has been calculated that the total sum of pension assets under management in the United Kingdom exceeds the sum for the rest of the European Union combined. On the continent, perhaps only the Netherlands has a comparable private pensions industry. Governments in other countries, particularly some southern European ones, have colossal off-balance-sheet debt. When they promise pensions to their electorate, all they are doing is hoping that a future generation of taxpayers will meet those obligations.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid–Sussex): Will my right hon. Friend speculate on why the Government should have done such a stupid thing? Although it is easy for Opposition Members to understand why the Government abolished tax relief on health insurance—it was out of pure spite and malice—it seems inexplicable that they could have done such a stupid thing with savings.

Mr. Heathcoat–Amory: I am genuinely at a loss to give my hon. Friend an answer to his question. We have racked our brains to try to determine why the Government should have done something that was not only wrong in macro-economic terms, as I explained, but contradicted their express desire to get people off welfare and on to private provision and self-reliance. I can only speculate that their action was due to ignorance and, perhaps, the instinctive reaction of a Labour Government to tax, which is to try to tax their way out of any difficulty.

Mr. Hammond: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government may have hoped that those who were bearing the tax might not notice that they were bearing it? It was a back-door tax which many pensioners did not appreciate they were paying until Conservative Members drew their attention to it.

Mr. Heathcoat–Amory: I think that my hon. Friend has part of the answer—that the Government hoped that no one would notice. They thought that instead of taxing people directly, they could tax corporations and pension funds, which do not themselves have votes. However, millions of people who rely on those pension funds now know perfectly well that the Government effectively conducted a £5 billion-a-year-raid on pensioners and contributors to pension funds.

Last year's Budget, therefore, will always be known as the Robert Maxwell memorial Budget. That is entirely appropriate as at least two of the Ministers conducting that raid had first-hand experience of how the late Robert Maxwell handled his business affairs. So the Government did not get away with it, but the damage created by that Budget will be with us for many more years. It was compounded this year when the Government returned to the subject and used the change in the system of corporation tax to smuggle in a back-door tax increase, borne this time by corporations and the larger business sector in particular.

5.30 pm

When we debated the economy yesterday, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury again asserted that the Government had cut the rate of corporation tax. That may be true in nominal terms, although the Government have a long way to go before they match our record. In 1979, we inherited a corporation tax rate of 52 per cent. and by gradual degrees, year upon year, we reduced it. All the Labour Government have done is to signal that there will be a further 1 per cent. reduction, which will not take effect until next April.

Companies and the Confederation of British Industry are concerned that, despite a nominal reduction, there has been an actual increase in the burden of corporation tax. I am not making an allegation or giving the House an opinion; I invite hon. Members to consult page 18 of the Budget statement, which shows that the abolition of advance corporation tax and the introduction of quarterly payments will increase tax by £100 million in the current financial year, by £1,600 million next year and by a full £2 billion in the year 2000-01.

Mr. Hammond: Are not the Government engaged in utterly cynical manipulation? They are bringing forward in a one-off shift tax revenues that would have been enjoyed later so that they can spend them during the period of this Government and, hopefully from their point of view, buy their way back into power at the next general election?

Mr. Heathcoat–Amory: Yes. My hon. Friend is entirely right. It is particularly short-sighted because the Government are relying on those same larger companies to provide the extra jobs that they need for their so-called welfare-to-work programme. If they persist in taxing those companies, it will rapidly turn into a work-to-welfare programme. There is already evidence that the labour market is turning, and investment is also affected. The same Red Book published in March shows a steady and continuing reduction in investment, particularly by the business sector. That can only be a consequence of the increased tax burden that businesses are expected to bear.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Could not the position get even worse? Not only will companies be less inclined to invest because of the extent to which the tax burden on them is increased, but if the economy continues to turn down as a direct result of Government action and inaction—manufacturing is already in recession—will not that additional £2 billion a year of cash-flow burden on British industry make all the difference to the survival or the collapse and bankruptcy of British businesses? Therefore, there may be an escalating effect. The Government may be launching a vicious circle which will be damaging to output and to employment for a long time.

Mr. Heathcoat–Amory: Yes. My hon. Friend makes a good point. The measures are pro-cyclical; they are reinforcing what is already an emerging recession. The effective increases in corporation tax will hit companies precisely when they are already experiencing a recession. The damage has not yet become entirely apparent.

Another issue concerns our general competitiveness and our position in the European Union and in the wider world. One of the great—and, we hope, lasting—achievements of the previous Conservative Government is that we established a low-taxation structure. We are the envy of Europe. Indeed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer in one of his disguises goes round the European Union lecturing other countries about the problems of high taxes, particularly on labour, and the need for them to introduce flexible labour markets. At the same time he is undermining precisely those achievements at home, so it is little wonder that he is now excluded from Euro X and the other committees on which such matters are discussed. They have spotted a degree of hypocrisy. The Chancellor is telling them to do what he is failing to do at home.

We hope that tomorrow we shall be debating the increase in indirect taxation on transport fuel, for example, which is eroding the competitiveness of our haulage industry, but at least we thought that we had entrenched a competitive advantage for Britain in terms of business taxes which makes us a beneficiary of inward investment from the European Union and the rest of the world.

Mr. Soames: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the competitive advantage which, indeed, was well entrenched, has become eroded in such a way—even within the past year—that in my constituency and neighbouring constituencies, quite substantial numbers of jobs are already beginning to flow out of manufacturing industry? What does my right hon. Friend have to say for the future when the impact of the ill-thought-out and ill-conceived changes to corporation tax will further hit manufacturing industry?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The damage is already apparent, and we have not yet had the full impact of the changes in corporation tax. The figures that I quoted from the Red Book show that what is a problem today is in danger of becoming a catastrophe tomorrow unless avoiding action is taken. New clause 5 goes some way towards at least drawing the teeth of the change in corporation tax and bringing relief to some sectors of British industry that are faced with effective tax increases.

The Government have abolished advance corporation tax, but replaced it with a system of interim payments whereby larger companies will have to make payments on account, which represent an effective tax increase.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): I have listened to my right hon. Friend for the past five or seven minutes, and have yet to hear any recognition from the Opposition that, when corporation tax is reduced by 1 per cent. next year, it will be at its lowest rate ever.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Yes, but the hon. Gentleman has not understood my point. Businesses are not concerned about the nominal headline rate of corporation tax if the actual tax that they pay goes up. Labour's world is all about theory. When Labour Members see a cut of 1 per cent., they assume that all the companies in their constituencies will pay less corporation tax. The hon. Gentleman may have been nodding off when I quoted from the Red Book. Even the Chancellor's own arithmetic shows that there is an effective increase in the tax burden on companies in Britain of £2 billion a year. Does the hon. Gentleman not understand that simple point? If he will not accept it from me, will he do the House the honour of spending the next few minutes reading the Chancellor's Budget statement, which sets that point out with commendable clarity?

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the position is even worse than he has described? He has been describing the stagnation part of inflation, but by directing their attentions to corporate taxation and interest rates, which have been shown increasingly to have a greater effect on the corporate sector than on the personal sector, the Government are not addressing inflation.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend is right. I hope that he will catch your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to elaborate on that point.

I should like to establish the fact—this is not a contestable opinion—that the Government are smuggling in a real increase in the burden of corporation tax suffered by corporate Britain. When investment falls, as it is due to do, and unemployment increases, the Government will have only themselves to blame.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): The right hon. Gentleman is confusing cash flow with tax burden. The changes will bring forward tax revenues, but the net present value of tax due by UK plc has gone dov.n. He should welcome that, not try to confuse issues—or is he the one who is confused?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Gentleman has missed the point. Bringing forward a tax payment is an effective increase in tax, hitting the cash flow of companies and costing them money. If the hon. Gentleman had to pay his tax bill a year earlier than he had been used to, he would resent the change and regard it as a burden on his finances and his ability to spend on other items. The two Labour interventions simply underline our arguments.

If the Government had wanted the change to be tax-neutral, they could have taken the advice of the CBI and put back the payment dates for corporation tax by two months. They did not do that, because they wanted the exercise to raise tax. That is what we are complaining about. The consequences will be long-lasting and very damaging.

The Government are asking companies to predict their profits. Companies will have to pay tax on estimated profits, which may well change. Many companies make unexpected capital gains or losses, perhaps towards the end of their accounting period.

Mr. Derek Twigg (Halton): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The new clause is specifically about the retail industry, which the right hon. Gentleman has not mentioned. I wonder when he will speak to the new clause.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman is responsible for his speech. So far I have found him to be in order.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Gentleman thinks that he can do your job better than you can, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but we heard almost nothing from him in Standing Committee. Many times we had to do his job for him, trying to stand up for the interests of businesses in his constituency about which he was silent. He failed to do his job upstairs and now he thinks that he can do your job better. I am grateful for your confirmation that everything that I have said is fully in order.

There is something seriously wrong with the system of the interim payments introduced by the Bill. The intention behind the new clause is to do something about that. Companies will have to predict their profits, which will be very difficult, particularly for those with marked seasonal variations in their profits. Leisure and tourism is a big industry in my constituency. Almost by definition, it is highly seasonal, with profits tending to be made in the summer. Similarly, many retailing companies, particularly the larger ones, make most of their profit in the run-up to Christmas. That is particularly true of companies that sell discretionary items such as jewellery or greetings cards.

The system of corporation tax payments laid down in the Bill makes no provision for seasonal variations. If a company makes most of its profits towards the end of the financial year, it will be asked to pay tax on profits that it has not yet earned.

5.45 pm

Mr. Geraint Davies: Why does the new clause refer specifically to the retailing industry, and not to industries with seasonal variations in profitability, including tourism? Does that have anything to do with the fact that the shadow Chancellor has an interest in retailing, as do other hon. Members who were on the Standing Committee?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: That was not a tremendously telling intervention. As the hon. Gentleman will remember, we discussed seasonality in Committee. I regretted very much at the time that the hon. Gentleman failed to participate in the debate. I am glad that we can, perhaps, look forward to a contribution from him now. We are restricted in the new clauses that we can table on Report. We have chosen the retailing sector to illustrate the problem. If, as I hope, the Paymaster General accepts what we have in mind, he can easily widen the concept to bring relief to manufacturing, processing and service companies that are similarly affected. We have chosen the retail sector because it illustrates particularly well the problem that we are trying to deal with.

It is accepted that many companies have a seasonal variation in their profits. The requirement to make interim regular payments that bear no relation to how the profits are made is inequitable, forcing companies to pay tax on profits that they have not yet earned.

Mr. Hammond: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the provision might require a company to borrow money to pay tax if its revenue pattern was highly seasonal and it did not have great reserves out of which to make the payments?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: That is indeed the case. Such companies may make little or no profit during the first six or nine months of the financial year and they will have to borrow money to fund their tax payments. In the final three months of the year, when they make most of their profits, they will be able to repay the money, but they will have lost the interest.

When we debated the issue, the Paymaster General seemed sympathetic to our case. He correctly pointed out that the regulations on the mechanism and timing of payments are out for consultation; that consultation period does not end until 15 July. However, we do not need to wait until 15 July to know what companies want. The British Retail Consortium has already submitted its ideas for relieving its members of the burden.

We have learnt the hard way during the passage of the Bill that, although the Government may express sympathy in Committee, they do nothing about the problem on Report. New clause 1, which we have just debated, was a good example of that. The Paymaster General said that he entirely understood the plight of poorer, non-taxpaying pensioners who were not receiving their dividend tax credits. He said that something would be done about that and that he would return to the issue on Report, but he did not. No amendments or new clauses were tabled until we raised the subject, in an attempt to get the Government to deliver on the sympathetic noises that they made upstairs.

We are in the same danger in this debate. In Committee, the Paymaster General said that he was minded to look at the British Retail Consortium's suggestions, and might respond in due course. Here is an opportunity to make him do so. If not, the consultation period will end, the Government will make up their mind and they will propose regulations that this House will never scrutinise in any way because they do not provide for any affirmative vote by this House or any scrutiny by any Committee.

A theme of the Bill—on which we have commented many times—is that there is far too much reliance on Treasury regulations, promulgated by the Treasury according to its own assessment of the situation, which may or may not bear some relation to assurances given earlier. We shall never again have an opportunity to express an opinion, let alone to vote on the matter.

Mr. Love: I apologise to the right hon. Gentleman for inadvertently calling him "my right hon. Friend" earlier. I assume that he will take that comment in the spirit in which it is meant. Does he consider the new clause to be woolly, in that it refers to having "special regard to the trading patterns and profitability of the retailing industry"?

What are we supposed to make of that? Will not the net effect of the new clause simply be to increase the complexity of the regulations about which the Opposition are complaining?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No, that is not the case. The British Retail Consortium would not have proposed the idea unless it thought that it would be of advantage to its members. Retailers do not believe that the measure will bring additional and unnecessary complexity. This is a modest way in which the Government can respond to the corporate sector and undo some of the damage that the rest of their corporation tax proposals will do.

Mr. Hammond: Does my right hon. Friend recall the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) complaining in Committee about woolly clauses in the Bill, requiring reams of regulation to be proposed by the Government thereafter?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend is absolutely right.

The question of regulation is a constitutional issue. It has been noticed by outside commentators that there is greater reliance on the use of secondary legislation in the Bill, and that is highly undesirable. The Law Society commented that, in some cases, it was unprecedented. A new source, which we have not quoted—because I have only seen its submission recently—is the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, which said:

"A reading of this Finance Bill results in the feeling that much of it is missing. Continually, clauses simply provide for a delegated authority to permit regulations to be drawn up."

It points out that substantive issues of taxation—the amount of tax, when it is to be paid and by whom—are not in the Bill either. They are delegated to subsequent secondary legislation which, in most cases, will never be debated at all. The institute expressed

"very strong reservations about the wider use of regulations."

If that outside commentator expresses strong reservations, how much more should we—as Members of a Parliament that came into existence to guard the taxation of the people and to ensure that it did not fall into arbitrary hands?

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland expressed similar concerns about the attitude of the Government during the passage of the Scotland Bill? It was concerned that many aspects of the Bill were being left to regulations, including important points such as, for example, the definition of who would be eligible to be a taxpayer under the Scottish Parliament. That matter was left in a rather woolly state by the end of the passage of the Bill, and it is the subject of regulations that we have not seen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We would be going somewhat wide of the amendment if we started to discuss that intervention.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I had better not be drawn too far down that line, but I think that it would be in order to relate that point to the new clause, which attempts to correct exactly the problem to which the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Swinney) has drawn our attention—the use of primary legislation to give delegated powers to the Government to propose secondary legislation which will never be scrutinised.

The measures have been called Henry VIII clauses, and we debated them in Committee. Henry VIII used the statute of declarations to ensure that pretty well anything he said had the force of law. He could amend or repeal any statute simply by issuing a proclamation. The Government are getting perilously close to that in the Bill—and, indeed, in the clause dealing with corporation tax. They give to the Treasury almost unparalleled powers to amend any statute which it sees fit to bring into the new system of corporation tax.

Clause 30(5) states that regulations under the section

"may make such modifications of any provision of the Taxes Acts, or . . . may apply such provisions of the Taxes Acts, as the Treasury think necessary or expedient for or in connection with giving effect to the provisions of this section."

That is an extraordinarily wide provision. It is really saying that the Treasury can do what it likes if it thinks that it is bringing the system of corporation tax into effect. The point is that we shall never have a further opportunity to give an opinion on the matter, still less to vote on it.

Mr. Gibb: Are not the regulations in connection with quarterly corporation tax payments different from other Treasury regulations, which deal with the administration of tax, in that the details of the regulations will determine the burden of tax that will be paid by companies? The timing of the payments is part and parcel of the burden, and, therefore, the regulations go much wider than previous Treasury regulations.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend is, characteristically, entirely accurate. The £2 billion extra burden of taxation, to which I have referred, is not provided for in the Bill, and is contingent on regulations that we have not seen. How can this House pass a Bill which apparently gives effect to the Government's arithmetic, but does not include it?

I urge the House seriously to consider accepting the new clause, which would go some way towards correcting the problem by creating the possibility of future regulations. We would then, at least in one small way, lay down in the Bill what the Government must do to relieve the burden on the retailing sector of the economy. That is a modest request. It does not go nearly far enough to correct the damage in the Bill but, at the very least, it would bring relief to a sector of the economy that will suffer because of a failure by the Government to understand the seasonal pattern of its trading activities.

Mr. Derek Twigg: Given the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has shares in a retailer, and the shadow Chancellor is a director of Asda, how seriously can we take their comments? Are they in someone's interests, or is the right hon. Gentleman speaking to a genuine new clause on the retail industry?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Right hon. and hon. Members are responsible for declaring their own interests. It is not a matter for debate here in the Chamber.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: That was a stupid intervention by the hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg)—something that is becoming characteristic. It might interest hon. Members to know that the hon. Gentleman has said more during this debate than he did during the entire Committee proceedings when we scrutinised a 400-page Bill, which closely affects his constituents and on which he remained completely silent. We debated retirement relief and matters of taxation adversely affecting small and medium businesses in his constituency—we know that because letters from them were copied to us—and the hon. Gentleman remained silent. Now he pops up to make an entirely irrelevant remark about a new clause tabled by the Opposition.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The matter before us is not what happened in Committee, but the new clause. We must discuss the new clause.

6 pm

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: You are right, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I was mistaken in giving way to the hon. Member for Halton. I shall not make that mistake again in this debate. However, I shall respond directly to his point. It may interest him to know that food retailing companies would probably be the last to get a concession from the new clause because their business is less seasonal than most. Any company selling goods will of necessity probably not experience highly seasonal variation. Companies that show a marked increase in sales around Christmas will probably chiefly benefit.

I hope that the House will give serious consideration to a modest measure to repair at least some of the damage caused by the Bill.

Mr. Flight: New clause 5 would not only protect retail industries but put the Treasury on notice in forming its regulations to consider all seasonal industries and protect their cash flow from the effects of moving to the new pattern of seasonal payments. The quarterly payments of corporation tax will have to be made in the third and fourth quarters of the current financial year before many companies have earned the profits to pay them. As we have heard, many companies will have to base their payments on predictions.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) has pointed out, the new clause is a minor attempt to correct the poor history of this Government wading into massive reform of the corporation tax system without considering all the implications. First, foreign income dividends were forgotten about, and, in changing the system, the Government proposed quarterly payments. In doing so, they forgot that such payments would bring forward the payment of tax, and that many businesses have extremely seasonal patterns of trading.

Mr. Gibb: My hon. Friend is generous to the Government in saying that they forgot that the proposal would mean bringing forward corporation tax receipts. I put it to him that the Government did not forget; they were fully aware of that by-product of the measure and they wanted the revenue.

Mr. Flight: I am sure that the Government do want the revenue and, as I shall describe, the objective of the measures is massively to boost revenue without the citizens at large being aware that that is occurring. I suggest also that the professionals in the Treasury often have to work on these matters in haste without thinking through all the detailed implications of the changes. I refer in particular to the failure to consider the effect on foreign income dividends, which my hon. Friend described in great detail when we considered the previous Finance Bill.

One intended effect of new clause 5 would be to allow firms simply to pay less corporation tax in the first and second instalments and more in the later instalments. That is analogous to the system that obtains in the USA.

The crucial point is not only the additional tax that will be paid—I shall move on to the total of that later—but that we are moving into a phase of economic downturn. We do not know whether that will be a recession, but it is unwise of the Government to impose additional, major cash-flow burdens on business after they have already substantially put up taxation in other ways. It has been pointed out that it is also pro-cyclical and is likely to encourage the worst aspects of the economic cycle.

The problem that new clause 5 aims to tackle arises also from the Chancellor's penchant for disingenuous headline grabbing when presenting the Budget. He made a bold announcement in the House that corporation tax was coming down by one percentage point. Only later did we learn that the true effect—the cash flow effect and the figures recorded in the Red Book—is a substantial increase in the taxation being paid by companies. The measure adds £1.6 billion of taxation in 1999-2000, £2 billion in 2000-01 and £3.1 billion in 2001-02, which is a total of £6.7 billion over those three years. Substantially more taxation will be paid than will be cut by the reduction in corporation tax by 1 percentage point to 30 per cent.

Mr. Love: The hon. Gentleman quoted from figures for the next three years, but did not quote those for the following years when the net effect will be to reduce the burden on companies. Perhaps he could set the record straight.

Mr. Flight: Self-evidently, the effect on the rate of corporation tax will eventually be that it is 30 per cent. rather than 31 per cent., but, equally self-evidently, for the next three to four years, there will be a substantial increase in the burden of taxation paid by companies. I repeat that the increase is being imposed at a point in the economic cycle when it may be extremely negative for employment and investment.

Mr. Gibb: Another point is that the Government's guarantee that they will not increase corporation tax extends only to the end of this Parliament, so by the time the measure becomes revenue-neutral or begins to give back money to the companies, the Government—if they are re-elected—could easily raise the rate of corporation tax.

Mr. Flight: My hon. Friend makes an important point. We hope that the country will be saved from the re-election of a Government who mess around with our tax system as foolishly as they have done over the past two years. My hon. Friend is correct to point out that, faced with potentially deteriorating tax revenues as the cycle turns negative, there is no guarantee that, if re-elected, this Administration would not increase the rate of corporation tax. He is correct: the net effect can be judged only between now and the next election, and it will be a substantial increase in the amount of taxation paid by companies.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells pointed out in describing the background to the changes, they arise from the sad change to the imputation system of taxation and the consequent substantial tax on savings. It has been doubly unfortunate that the tax on savings has produced a fall of almost 2 per cent. in the rate of savings at a time when any economist would say that we need a rise in savings. That fall has produced a rise in consumption.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We really must keep to the new clause.

Mr. Flight: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We are trying to correct one of the minor mistakes resulting from the changes to corporation tax that have been introduced over the past two years. Those changes have had a negative impact on the economy, and threaten to have a negative micro-impact on seasonal industries such as the retailing and tourist sectors, which will suffer from the new quarterly payments of corporation taxation. Reforms introduced in a hurry and designed to raise revenue have ended up creating the sort of problems with which the new clause is intended to deal.

Neither the new system of payment nor the increase in corporation taxation has attracted much attention—the public are scarcely aware of them. The corporate sector has been cash-rich for the past three years; its cash flows have been able to absorb the rise in taxation that has been imposed. But over the next two years, companies' cash flows will swing the other way. It is then that these corporation tax measures will really bite. It is then that retailers and their employees will pay the price for the changes. The very least we can do to counteract what the Government have been doing is to endorse the new clause, which attempts to cushion the cyclical industries from a tax change that will be a major cause of unemployment.

Mr. Derek Twigg: The hon. Gentleman has referred several times to cyclical industries, in the plural. Why, then, does the new clause relate only to retailers? That question was not answered when it was asked earlier.

Mr. Flight: The answer has already been given: the new clause is specific and refers to how the new quarterly payment system will be brought into effect by the Treasury. The intention is to persuade the Treasury to draft the relevant regulations with reference to all cyclical industries, retailing being the main one.

Mr. Edward Davey: The debate has wandered fairly wide of the subject matter so far. Both the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) and the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) knocked around the issues surrounding the introduction of a new system of corporation tax payments. Indeed, they reminded me of some of the world cup football matches in which the back lines have played for time during the last five minutes of the game. Of course we hope that the England team will be doing just that in a few hours' time—playing for time before their victory.

The debate has been enlivened by a few lunges from the Government Benches which proved in the end rather untimely. One such lunge was made by the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies), who is not in his place, at the right hon. Member for Wells. The intervention concerned cash flows, but the hon. Gentleman completely missed the point.

The introduction of the new system has been driven by financial motives. The Government have realised that there is a time cost for tax payments, and have sought to recoup it for themselves. They will get the benefit of this revenue, and the corporate sector will be the worse for it. In Committee, the hon. Member for Croydon, Central told us of his experience of multinational companies, so he will know how many companies have built their profits on float income. The time cost of capital is an important factor in any business operation, as the Government have apparently realised—although they now seek the benefit for themselves.

The short-term financial motives of the Government apart, there is nothing wrong in principle with the new system; but the way in which the Government have introduced it has given rise to suspicions of their motives. A new system throws up new problems—problems of implementation, problems for the corporate sector, problems that were not relevant to the previous system. It may throw up problems that the civil servants have never before had to consider.

The new clause highlights just such a problem which did not occur under the old system—the problem of seasonal profits. Profits vary throughout the year, and the new system of corporation tax payment will serve to highlight that fact, particularly for businesses that generate most of their profits in the second half of the year: most notably, retail companies that make most of their profits in the last quarter.

The new system of paying corporation tax in even quarterly instalments, based on forecast taxable profits for the current year, penalises seasonal businesses such as retailers that do not earn their profits evenly. Because they will have to pay tax up front, they will be required to pay it even before the profits have been earned. That may force them to borrow, which will be a significant extra cost. Therefore, the new system discriminates against companies whose business activities happen to be seasonal, and there would seem to be no justification for such discrimination—we heard no grounds for it in Committee.

The cost of borrowing will be much higher for private sector firms than it would be for the Government. Companies with seasonal profits may be given a higher risk assessment because it will not be known whether Christmas, for instance, will turn out to be a good trading period.

The right hon. Member for Wells mentioned businesses whose profits are linked primarily to the festive season—jewellers, for instance. My hon. Friends and I have been approached by Signet plc, a holding group for a number of high street jewellers whose profits are earned almost entirely in the last two or three months of the year. They will be particularly affected by the new payment system. Toy retailers and companies selling cards and Christmas decorations fall into the same category. Fireworks manufacturers, who would not be covered by the new clause, as they are not retailers, will also be adversely affected by the failure to take seasonality into account in the new system.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the argument of some Labour critics that it would be open to retail industries, especially those who rely on big Christmas sales, simply to change their year end to get around the seasonality problem? Will he explain why that argument is so fallacious and defective?

Mr. Davey: As I understand it, the payments must be made in equal amounts in the four quarters, so changing the year end would not get around the problem.

Other industries are affected by seasonality—tourism has been mentioned. I do not understand why such firms should be punished because they operate in a specific marketplace and undertake a particular business activity. The state takes money from individuals and businesses to finance its activities on behalf of the community, and it should make it as easy as possible for companies and individuals to pay tax. It should not discriminate against some individuals or some businesses in the way it does.

The right hon. Member for Wells said that draft regulations were out to consultation. We have heard that, in different places, the Paymaster General has expressed sympathy for those who will be affected by the problems that are being outlined and highlighted in the debate. He said:

"We shall re-examine the draft regulations in the context of the" British Retail Consortium's "proposals and we shall inform the House of our view."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 19 May 1998; c. 254.]

I hope that tonight we shall hear not just sympathetic words, but promises of action. The consultation period may end on 15 July, but the Paymaster General must have heard many representations—not only tonight, but well before tonight—about people's worries about his proposed system of payment. He would not exceed his remit if he gave a hint of the Government's thinking. If he feels unable to do so, will he tell us when the Government will publish their response to the consultation? Will it be in the depths of the summer, when the House is in recess, so that the House cannot hold the Government to account? We should like a date from him.

The Paymaster General may want to accept new clause 5 tonight, but I doubt it. He may argue that it is a partial solution to the problem that he is apparently so sympathetic about; I am sure that Conservative Members would admit that it is indeed partial. However, at least he could respond to the spirit of the new clause. I have often argued that Ministers should answer the spirit of the debate, and he should do so tonight.

Mr. Gibb: Given that the new clause merely enables the Government to draft their regulations on the basis of the words in the new clause—that is, it enables them to include some indication that they are taking into account the seasonal effects of retail industry—surely there is no technical reason why the Paymaster General cannot accept the new clause. All the details and planning that the Government need to do can still be done in the regulations.

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman has a point, but it is important that we do not allow the Government to get away with limiting allowances for seasonality to the retail industry; other industries also suffer from the problem.

I hope that, in reviewing the regulations and replying to the debate, the Paymaster General will address some of his comments not only to new clause 5, but to the system proposed by the British Retail Consortium. That proposed add-on to the Government's new system of corporation tax payments suggests that the Government lay down some criteria that would help us determine seasonality, possibly borrowing from the United States system, so that if 70 per cent. of a company's profits were earned in the latter half of the year, that would enable it to elect to pay its corporation tax on actual, not forecast, profits. That 30:70 per cent. split works in the United States; I cannot see why the Government cannot borrow from the way in which that system operates.

The Government may argue that the United States corporation tax system is famous—or infamous—for its other complexities, and that it imposes heavy burdens on United States companies. We are not arguing for borrowing the United States corporation tax system lock, stock and barrel. We would not want the onerous burdens that it places on United States companies to be imposed on British companies, but it would be missing the point to use that argument against borrowing something like the 30:70 criterion. A small element borrowed from the United States system would significantly improve the proposed system of corporation tax payments. We believe that there is no need to imitate the US system point by point; one can borrow the best and leave the worst.

I have spoken to members of the British Retail Consortium, who are in no doubt that they would be more than happy to bear any extra burden placed on them by giving them the option to elect to pay on the basis of actual, not forecast, profits. We are talking about companies that have professional tax departments. In the main, they are large companies, which are more than capable of dealing with any extra burden. To use the words that the Economic Secretary is most likely to utter on the subject, it would be "nae bother" for them to deal with such burdens.

The Government have said that they are anxious that the system that they propose retains simplicity—that we do not complicate it. That argument is not well founded, given the Government's other actions on the Bill. They have introduced complexities into tax legislation, especially with their proposal on capital gains tax, and those complexities must be handled by individuals. The complexities that would be needed to give some sort of seasonality in the system for corporation tax payments would be simple by comparison with the complexities that the Government are introducing on CGT. The argument that the Government need to retain simplicity in the system does not stand up to examination.

I urge the Minister to say that the Government retain an open mind on seasonality, and that they will consider the issue, as it is a serious one for many of our country's largest and most successful companies.

Mr. Quentin Davies: This has been an extremely interesting debate. It has revealed something very significant about the Government's thinking, and it has strongly confirmed an impression that many of us have gained about the Government's fiscal policy. It has revealed that the Government do not understand the concept of cash flow. A most revealing intervention by a Labour Member made that absolutely clear.

Companies are more likely to fail for cash flow reasons than for any other reason. Cash flow is vital to a company's success, and cash flow planning is especially vital to the success of any small or growing company. Therefore, the idea that one can, with complete levity, say, "Oh, the £2 billion additional burden is just a cash flow burden; actual rates of tax have not changed," reflects, I am afraid, a complete lack of familiarity with some of the essential elements of business management, which is very disturbing in a Government in any country, especially in our own.

Mr. Hammond: My hon. Friend cannot know this and will be disappointed to hear it, but the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies), who made that intervention—he is not in his place—is one of the few Labour Members who claim to have real experience in business. Is it not utterly depressing that he displayed such a lack of understanding?

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend has said it all, but, with respect to him, I do not think that we should crow unduly. It may give Opposition Members cause for satisfaction and reassurance to see the Government's obvious failings and shortcomings, but the country will pay the price for that incompetence and inexperience, and I am afraid that the price will be paid by a very large number of businesses, and by those employees and investors whose futures depend on them.

What the Government are doing is comparable to what would happen if, for example, a company suddenly said that it would double, unilaterally and arbitrarily, the period of settlement of its invoices. That would create a great cash flow problem for the company's suppliers. Alternatively, the company might demand that all its customers pay in advance. That would create cash flow problems for its customers. In competitive markets, it might not matter unduly if a company behaved in that way, because the suppliers would decline to supply it or would supply it only on more onerous terms, and the customers would place their business elsewhere.

However, if a monopoly business behaved in that way, and could enforce on its suppliers or its customers whatever payment terms it chose arbitrarily from time to time to enforce, the situation would be exactly comparable with that of a Government—a tax-raising authority—who arbitrarily said that all tax payments must be brought forward, and the hell with the resulting cost to the companies paying the tax.

That is a serious matter, which leads directly to the second point on which the debate has been particularly revealing. It has strongly confirmed a clear impression that the whole country has begun to appreciate: that the Government believe in surreptitious taxation. They have launched a sinister tradition of surreptitious taxation. It is easy to see that that will lead to fiscal and other forms of tyranny. It is arbitrary and means that the British taxpayer, who, on the whole, believes that Governments act in reasonable good faith and that Government pronouncements can be taken at face value, in accordance with the normal meaning of the English language, is learning that he was wrong. What you see is not what you get with this Government.

The Government believe that they have found a way of taxing the public and taxing business, and then being able to deny that any taxation has taken place. That was the basis of the pensions tax—the abolition of the dividend tax credit. The Government thought that they were extremely clever. They get £5 billion a year, which they are indeed taking, out of pension funds, and they thought that the public would not quite understand that their prospect of receiving a pension in retirement had been reduced by exactly the same figure.

We have seen the same thing today. The Government try to deny that companies face an annual burden of £2 billion more of corporation tax, even though, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) pointed out, that figure derives from the Government's Red Book. They say that corporation tax has not been increased—indeed, that it has been reduced. The debate has provided a depressing insight, but we should be realistic and recognise how the Government have operated over the past year, and how they no doubt intend to continue for the rest of their mandate.

Two anomalies and unfairnesses arise from the changes in corporation tax, the abolition of advance corporation tax and the decision to levy quarterly payments on companies to replace the existing system of corporation tax. They are two sources of economic problems, both potential burdens on business. Although they are related, they are separate and should be considered separately.

The first is the issue of predictability. The Paymaster General and I had an earlier exchange on the subject. I suggested that, however clever one was and however well run one's business was, it was not possible to predict how things would work out over the next year. The hon. Gentleman, who has great faith in his business abilities, said that all companies produce business plans. There was something of the dialogue of the deaf proceeding between us.

The Paymaster General must acknowledge that, however well managed a company is, and however convincing its business plan may be on the basis of assumptions made before the beginning of a financial year, that plan is only as good as the assumptions on which it is based. If the assumptions change as a result of some exogenous and unpredicted event, the business plan may no longer be valid.

Who could have predicted the collapse in Asia? Is the hon. Gentleman going to tell us that he predicted it? I shall be happy to give way, if he wants to tell the House that he knew a year ago that the Asian markets would collapse and the Asian countries would devalue massively. That is an example of an unpredicted and exogenous shock. There could be many more shocks much nearer home, of a more sectorally or geographically limited kind, which the hon. Gentleman can no doubt think of as well as I can.

The issue of predictability arises immediately, if companies must make payments on the basis of their anticipated net revenues and, therefore, taxable income for a given year, when those predictions may prove to be unsound retrospectively. That is a pro-cyclical attack on the company. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wells sometimes corrects me for using technical language in Finance Bill Standing Committee debates, but I am glad that he used that term earlier. It is not a particularly technical term, but it is the right one.

[Mr. Davies]

A pro-cyclical burden means that, if the company's profits are less than anticipated because of some unpredictable event, they will be further reduced because the tax charge is excessively high, by virtue of the mechanism that the Government deliberately and thoughtlessly introduced into our tax system. Pro-cyclical burdens are a very bad thing. It is extraordinary that one should have to give the Government such an elementary lecture.

It should be the concern of a good Government to avoid pro-cyclical burdens, whether in macro-economic management, which the Government have utterly failed to do—I shall not be drawn down that line as it is not directly germane to the new clause—or in the micro-economic area. We know that tax changes are enormously important because of their impact on the micro-economy, where the essential decisions on investment, resource allocation and wealth creation are made. The issue of predictability is important. It is fundamentally unsound to make tax payments premised on any assumption at all about future revenues.

The second issue, which has not always been separated in the discussion, is seasonality. Seasonality may be entirely predictable for a retail business. As has been pointed out in several contributions, not only retail businesses are seasonal—the tourist industry is a clear example. Under the measures proposed by the Government, the fact that seasonality is predictable will give businesses no relief from making an excessive tax payment early in the year, when their cash flow may be weak or even negative.

A perfectly sound business may make no money at all in January, February and March, but will still be forced to make a substantial tax payment, because it expects to make some money between October and Christmas. That is pro-cyclical. It places a larger cash flow burden on the company than it would naturally face as a result of operational conditions. That cannot be sensible. I beg the Government, even at this eleventh hour, to think again.

My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) referred to the way in which the Americans addressed the matter. They have never had an advance corporation tax system, so they have lived for a long time with the issues that the Government now face. They have a system under which, I gather, there is a 30:70 criterion. My hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) is the expert in these matters. Companies that expect to make more than 70 per cent. of their profits in the second half of the year can opt to make tax payments that are loaded at the back end of the year.

Will the Paymaster General, for once, give us clear answers to some serious questions? To what extent did the Paymaster General look at the American system and other systems around the world before he took a decision on this matter? What would be the cost to the Revenue in this country of implementing a system along the American lines? Let us assume that we introduced the American system exactly: a 70:30 breakdown. What would it cost? I am sure that the Paymaster General's officials have calculated that figure—if they have not, the Government have not done their homework and we should hear about that before we vote on the measure. When we know the answer to that question, it will give us a clue about the heart of the matter.

This measure is about advancing the Government's revenue in this Parliament, and hang the consequences for British industry, for the British economy and for our future wealth, prosperity and employment. It happens to be convenient—I wonder why—for the Labour Government to garner all the resources they can in the next two or three years in order to affect a greater measure of economic competence and a better record of economic achievement than the facts will justify under any circumstances.

Mr. Hammond: I shall add some brief comments to those of my hon. Friends. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I see that I have managed to introduce a note of consensus into the debate, as my announcement meets the approval of Government Members.

Whatever the Government say, the changes to the corporation tax system are revenue-driven. The Government talk about modernising the system, but it is clear that that is a sham and a smokescreen for an exercise in building a war chest through a one-off shift in the pattern of revenue, bringing forward into this Parliament revenues that Government would otherwise have enjoyed later. The measures that we have considered in Committee will require companies to make payments quarterly. As my hon. Friends have outlined, that gives rise to two quite distinct and separate problems. First, there is the problem of estimation. Companies will be required to make payments throughout the year based on their predicted profits for the whole year.

My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) explained eloquently the difficulties involved in doing that. The Paymaster General told us in Committee that all businesses are able to predict their profits and that they have mechanisms for doing so. However, if the Paymaster General reflects carefully, he will acknowledge that many companies have failed to predict their profits accurately and effectively. Retailers who depend heavily on seasonal profits are one notable group that have failed, as a result of the large fluctuations that occur at the year's end, to predict accurately the profits that they will enjoy over the whole year.

If a retailer gets it wrong, overestimates his profits and begins to pay substantial corporation tax earlier in the year, only to find that, because of a downturn in business, he is squeezed later in the year, he will be doubly jeopardised. He will have to live with the cash flow burden of having made those payments earlier in the year. However, if a retailer makes the opposite mistake and underestimates his likely profits for the year, he will face a penal regime which requires him to pay additional penalties when making up those payments later. Companies will be required to perform an exact and precise exercise in an area where history and experience suggest that it is not possible to do so with any accuracy.

The second problem that companies will face is much more obvious—the impact on their cash flow. The proposed new clause focuses particularly on the retail sector, in which a substantial number of companies have seasonal patterns of cash flow and profitability. Those companies that make advance corporation tax payments during the earlier part of the year will not only face making those payments but, because of the seasonal nature of their businesses, typically invest large sums to build up stocks for their busy period.

Companies involved in the jewellery, toy, Christmas card or Christmas decoration businesses do not operate for only two or three months: they operate all year round. Christmas crackers are manufactured in January and February and are financed and stockpiled. That stockpiling represents a heavy drain on the cash flows of those companies. The Government propose to pile an additional burden on that cash flow strain by requiring those companies to make payments during a lean time in anticipation of profits that they may or may not make later in the year. According to my definition, that amounts to kicking a man when he is down.

The hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) apparently failed to understand—although my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat–Amory) did his best to explain it in simple terms—that, if we ask a company to pay £X million to the Treasury in January or June, that is £X million that that company cannot spend on investment in plant and equipment or on working capital for its business, thus generating jobs and prosperity in the economy. That is common sense, and it is not much to expect of the Government that they should make special provision in the most exceptional cases for companies that have seasonal cash flow and profitability patterns.

We know that the draft regulations are out to consultation. The Paymaster General will no doubt tell us in a moment that, when he has completed that consultation, he will amend the draft regulations if he believes that there is a case to answer. However, we are anxious that the Government should state in fairly broad terms in the Bill that they intend to have regard to the special circumstances of seasonal retailers. It is not good enough that the regulations procedure is being used once again—even at the draft stage—to avoid scrutiny in the House of the Government's proposals. The Government will be allowed to do their dirty work behind the scenes at the regulations level. I urge the Government, even at this late stage, to rethink the measure.

Mr. Gibb: I shall explain briefly the problem that the Government have created. Quarterly payments must be paid in months seven, 11, 14 and 17. That means that, in month seven of the current accounting period, a company must determine the profits on which its corporation tax is payable. It must then apply all the corporation tax rules, including the deductible and non-deductible items, to determine its tax bill—and it is still only seven months into the current accounting period. The company must then pay its first quarter amount based on a quarter of the bill.

The problem facing the retail sector is that much of the activity that determines its profits will not have occurred in month seven—or indeed in months eight or nine—of the accounting period. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. If Labour Members wish to conduct a conversation, I would prefer that they did so outside the Chamber.

Mr. Gibb: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The figures of retail companies, whose profits are determined in the last two or three months of the year, could fluctuate wildly. It is imperative that, in drafting the regulations, the Government come up with a new method that enables the retail sector to have some flexibility when calculating its profits for the full year. The profits that are determined in November or December could differ wildly from those estimated at the beginning of the year when companies must make their calculations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) quizzed the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey), about why companies do not simply change their year end. That would be a way around the problem because, if their busy period were at the beginning of the accounting period, companies would know what their profits were by month seven. The determinant period—for example, January and February or November and December—would be at the beginning of the accounting period and companies would know what had happened in that busy time.

The problem is that the stock exchange will want to see quoted retail groups' results for that busy period—which will determine the whole year's profits—as soon as possible after the event. Many retail groups have January year ends and, if such companies were to change that to another period, their value on the stock exchange would markedly decline because of the uncertainty inherent in having to wait a full year before the profits were reported to the exchange.

For those reasons, I urge the Government, when they have finished their consultation process, to take into account the serious concerns of the British Retail Consortium and the retail industry throughout Britain.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: We have had a long and wide-ranging debate on new clause 5. I hope to emulate the consensual approach of the hon. Members for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) and for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) in the brevity of my speech and by sticking closely to the issue.

The right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat–Amory) went off into his usual wide-ranging ineffectual attack on the Government's long-term measures to put right what a previous Conservative Government did wrong in the economy. However, I notice that he seems finally to have accepted the principle of the changes and is now down to criticising their implementation. I am not sure whether the same can be said for the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies). However, generally, the Conservative party is no longer seriously suggesting that, in the unlikely and impossible event of its ever being in government again, it would repeal the changes that we have introduced, be it the independence of the Bank of England, the code for fiscal stability or the abolition of tax credits to make a level playing field to encourage investment.

The Government have largely won the argument. There is no real argument for going back to an imputation system. No one will do that. There is no real argument for ending the operational independence of the Bank of England and returning its powers to the Treasury. The issue before us is the narrow point in new clause 5. Before I deal with that, there are one or two other things that I must say, particularly on secondary regulation, a matter to which Conservative Members return with boring regularity.

[Mr. Geoffrey Robinson]

All we have had—it is a pity that the quality of debate among Conservative Members has sunk to this—is a rehash in general and in detail of everything that was said in Committee on the Floor of the House and upstairs. We have had no new ideas from them whatever, other than a grudging final acceptance of the correctness of our approach to these matters. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton shakes his head, but is he seriously saying that he would rather we returned to a system of tax credits and advance corporation tax?

Mr. Gibb: The hon. Gentleman has completely ravaged Britain's corporation tax system solely because, in July, the Government wanted to raid Britain's pension funds to the tune of £5 billion a year. That is what we are paying for with these new complex provisions.

Mr. Robinson: The stock market is standing higher than on the day we took office, and the country continues to do well.

The Conservative Government's last three Finance Bills provided more than one dozen sets of regulation-making powers covering direct taxes alone. That is the extent of regulation under the previous Government. Three quarters of those regulations included powers to modify existing provisions in the taxes legislation. We need no lessons from Conservative Members on secondary regulations. I beg them to grow up in that respect and see that we are a Government who respect the proper prerogatives of this Parliament. The hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton well knows that, although the regulations will be introduced under the negative resolution procedure, hon. Members can pray against them.

The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford has a captivating interest in the American system. If we were to adopt that system en bloc, a high proportion of companies would pay the whole of their tax within the year, instead of just half of it as happens under the system that we have adopted. We considered the American system, but we have gone for one that is much better from that point of view. Moreover, our system includes a relatively small number of companies. We consulted on who should come within it and excluded the small and medium sectors.

I am looking to see whether Conservative Members have made any new points to which I should reply, but I cannot find any.

The new clause simply returns to an issue with which we dealt during the debate on new clause 30 in Committee of the whole House and again during the debate on amendment No. 8 to clause 36 in Standing Committee. As I made clear on both those occasions, the regulation-making power provided by clause 30 is already sufficiently wide to allow for the regulations governing the payment by large companies of their corporation tax by instalments from 1999 to include special rules for companies with seasonal trades. Therefore, the new clause is unnecessary, otiose and as useless as the Opposition.

Mr. Hammond: Is the Paymaster General, then, giving the House a commitment now that those regulations, when they are finalised, will include special provisions for retailers with highly seasonal patterns of profitability?

Mr. Robinson: No, I am not saying that. I am saying that the regulations are capable of doing that, so we do not need the new clause.

Much has been made by the Opposition of the alleged plight of retailers and others with businesses that have seasonal peaks and troughs in their profits, but many retailers do not have particularly seasonal trades. For example, I understand that supermarkets selling food—in fairness, this point was made by Conservative Members—earn their profits fairly evenly during the year, and many other retailing businesses are carried on by small or medium companies or by individuals, and so are not affected by the introduction of instalments.

I am aware that some large companies with retail businesses are quite highly seasonal, with sales, and therefore profits, peaking around Christmas and at sale times. The hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge mentioned some of them and obviously knows something about that sector. If that causes them to get their instalments wrong so that they pay their corporation tax late, they will be charged interest, but that will just reflect their late payment of corporation tax, and their use for a while of money that should have been paid over to the Exchequer. Similarly, if they pay too much corporation tax by instalments, they will get the extra back with interest. As Opposition Members know, the ratio of interest between what the Government pay and are paid has been brought into close, reasonably commercial proximity.

The Opposition have suggested that companies with seasonal profits should be allowed to pay their instalments based on actual tax-adjusted results for the previous six months. I think that that is the suggestion of the British Retail Consortium, which would confine it to companies consistently making less than 30 per cent. of their profits in their first half year. However, that would help few large companies, because few can consistently make upwards of 70 per cent. of their profits in the second half of the year, and it would be difficult to police.

This is simply another attempt by the Opposition to return to an issue that has already been thoroughly explored. I have said before that I am anxious to keep the instalment regime as simple as possible. It is no good the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) saying that, because the Government could not obtain in aspects of other legislation the simplicity that we would have wanted, it does not matter in this case. That is a perverse argument. The hon. Gentleman would be surprised at the extent to which we have achieved simplification in many areas, and, if we can obtain it, we must clearly go for it.

Introducing special rules for retail companies would inevitably add considerable complexity to the instalment rules while benefiting only a relatively small number of companies. However, we have received representations on the point which we are continuing to consider, along with all representations received during the consultation period, ending on 15 July, on the draft regulations. We shall take all those into account and let the House know our decision.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: These debates are achieving a sort of regularity. Conservative Members put up an unanswerable case and the Paymaster General blusters and flusters. On this occasion, he ended up virtually accepting our case, but he spoilt it all by saying that new clause 5 was unnecessary because the regulations under the Bill already make the same provision. However, we have learnt not to accept Government intentions but to try to tie them down so that they deliver on some of their words. We debated earlier this evening a new clause which we introduced precisely because the Government had failed to deliver on an expressed sympathy for the low-paid and poorer pensioners who had been hit, and continue to be hit, by the withdrawal of dividend tax credits in the Bill. We shall press the new clause to a vote to ensure that the Government deliver on their intentions.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of Labour's hidden tax rises will be affected if the Government do not accept the new clause? In the tourism industry, for example, large hotels in my constituency with variable profit fluctuations will have to pay higher corporation tax or file higher corporation tax returns than they would otherwise have done because of the interest penalties that will endure. It will be cheaper to pay the tax in advance—which is, in effect, a cost—rather than endure the penalties.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend has given a good example of the difficulties that businesses will face because of the Finance Bill as it stands. Our new clause would, in a modest way, relieve the ravages of Labour's high tax policy for a small sector of corporate Britain. We want to include it in the Bill, and this is our last chance to make that happen. The Paymaster General did not even refer to the fact that parts of the Bill will never be debated again because they will be relegated to secondary legislation.

I repeat that there is in the Chancellor's own Budget arithmetic a £2 billion a year increase in the effective rate of corporation tax, consequential on these quarterly payments. That is specified on page 18 of the Red Book, but it is not specified in the Bill, and hon. Members will not find any clause laying down how that sum is to be raised and who is to pay it.

Those who were Members of Parliament before us would be amazed that we are authorising a £2 billion a year increase in taxation which is to be laid down later in regulations that the House will never have a chance of debating, approving or voting against. We will betray the traditions of the House if we allow the Government to increase taxes in such a way, without giving ourselves any opportunity to express an opinion.

In a small way, through our new clause, we are ensuring that the parts of the retail sector that experience seasonal profits will have their interests at least partly protected. We have had a proper debate, which we have won, and we shall put the new clause, which should be incorporated in the Bill, to the test of a vote.

New clause 7

DEFINITION OF NATIONAL DEBT

'.—For the purposes of sections 152 and 153—

The "National Debt" shall be taken to include the principal amount of any non-governmental debt to the extent that such debt is guaranteed by the Government or by any organisation under its effective control or management and the amount of Government borrowing in any one year shall be calculated accordingly.'.—[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause attempts to incorporate into the Bill a tighter definition of what the Government mean by national debt. The matter has assumed greater importance since the publication, some two weeks ago, of the Government's public expenditure plans, which signal a marked increase in public expenditure under a smokescreen of fiscal rectitude.

The talk has been about imposing a discipline on the national account, but the reality underneath is that public expenditure is signalled to rise from next year and in every subsequent year by at least 2.75 per cent. in real terms. We estimate that the figure will be greater than that, once account is taken of all the changed definitions at the margin.

Thus, the question of definitions is important, particularly the frontier between capital and current expenditure. Those of us who have laboured in one of the professions thought that we understood the distinction between capital and revenue expenditure, but I do not think that the Government do. I tabled a simple question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer about whether "he plans to classify expenditure on hospital repairs as current or capital spending."

Any first-year accountancy student can answer that. Repairs are revenue, whereas alterations or additions are capital expenditure. However, the Chief Secretary answered, after some delay:

"Expenditure on hospital repairs will follow the classification rules for the national accounts."—[Official Report, 29 June 1998; Vol. 315, c.29.]

Therefore, either he does not know or it is still to be determined. A simple question received a very muddled response.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman inform me—I am genuinely ignorant about this—on whether exchanging the old shadow Chancellor for a new one is considered a repair or an alteration?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: If the hon. Gentleman wants to make a better attempt at a witty intervention, I hope he will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so that we can hear him develop that point, because it will obviously be very humorous. I am attempting to ask a serious question.

Are the Government adhering to normal accountancy rules in classifying expenditure? Judging by the reply that I have elicited, they have not made up their mind. That is a pity, because they have put enormous weight on the so-called golden rule under which the Government promise to borrow only for capital expenditure. If they are able to capitalise expenditure, they can meet that golden rule with almost any increase in overall public expenditure.

We tabled the new clause, which is modest in intent, to urge the Government to ensure that any off-balance-sheet lending is properly classified as national debt, if they extend a guarantee. The best example that we can think of is the channel tunnel rail link. Perhaps the Paymaster General can enlighten us, but it appears that the Government have extended a guarantee so that no risk, or not sufficient risk, has been transferred from the public sector. If so, the borrowing should surely be classified as national debt. The Government have every incentive to remove borrowing from the national debt so that they can, in effect, engage in public expenditure without it showing up in debt or breaching the golden rule, or the secondary rule, which places a limit on the ratio of debt to gross domestic product.

There is much confusion in this area. Changing a definition does not make something different. In the space of only three months, the Government have given up their objective of repaying national debt. The Red Book, which is only three months old, shows that, even under the most lax option of public expenditure, they had a clear intention of repaying debt. On page 121, it refers to the fact that the Government's calculations reflect "the projected debt repayment over the medium term."

In the expenditure statement issued less than three months later, all that was gone. There is now no provision for repaying national debt.

In government, things can move quickly. Promises and intentions made perhaps in good faith at Budget time are abandoned a few months later under the impact of a few broken promises. The Government are in difficulty over class sizes, they have broken their promises on hospital waiting lists, they have been panicked into taking the brakes off public expenditure, and they are reverting to tax and spend policies. The principles of national accounting should remain sacrosanct. They should not be able to manipulate the picture by changing definitions, particularly the definition of capital expenditure and revenue expenditure, simply to suit the political imperative.

New clause 7 would at least ensure that any debt guaranteed by the Government, or by any organisation under their control, would be classified as national debt. I do not seriously see how the Paymaster General can object to that, and I await his reply with interest.

Mr. Cranston: We had the usual trip around the houses with the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat–Amory). He spoke about the Government's confusion, but I think that he is totally confused. He moved a new clause that proposes a change in the definition of national debt to include "the principal amount of any non-governmental debt . . . guaranteed by the Government".

I suggest that that is incoherent.

If a guarantor guarantees an amount, there is a contingent liability, which depends, for example, on the risk of default by the principal debtor. One certainly does not attribute to the guarantor a debt for the full amount guaranteed. It is a contingent liability.

Mr. Gibb: If a bank guarantees a loan, it is obliged to account for the full extent of that guarantee as a liability on its balance sheet.

Mr. Cranston: We are talking about the definition of national debt, which is an entirely different concept.

The new clause would include in the definition of national debt any debts incurred by any other organisation under the Government's control or management. There is a legal argument as to whether the Export Credits Guarantee Department gives guarantees or grants insurance. The ECGD is under the control of the President of the Board of Trade. Is any debt guaranteed by ECGD to be taken into account in the national debt? That would be ludicrous.

The new clause is a typically incoherent amendment moved with the usual rhetoric by the right hon. Member for Wells. It signifies nothing, and I am sure that it will be rejected.

Mr. Gibb: The new clause is important, because the Government have consistently and deliberately attempted to manipulate the national accounts. On the private finance initiative, for example, there is a dispute between the Treasury and the Accounting Standards Board about exposure draft FRS5. The Government claim that the liability should not be on their balance sheet, but on the private sector.

The Accounting Standards Board accept that the liability should not appear on the Government's books, but only if the risk is transferred to the private sector. It is right. If it were to give in to pressure from the Treasury, the same accounting standards would apply to the private sector, and a swathe of debt would disappear from private sector balance sheets, which would lead in due course to company bankruptcies. The people to blame for that would be the auditors who had not applied sensible accounting methods to those companies' accounts.

Mr. Cranston: I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman a question about banking, as he invited me to do so earlier. Is not the aim of securitisation to get assets off the bank's balance sheet? It is a typical commercial practice.

Mr. Gibb: Yes—and it is important that, when securitisation takes place, there is a genuine transfer of the risk. That is why the integrity of organisations such as the ASB is so important, and why it is wrong for the Treasury to put pressure on the ASB to change its rules simply to suit the Treasury's convenience in getting debt off its own balance sheet.

That is the first way in which the Government are manipulating the accounts. We have also seen the accounting treatment of family credit. There has been almost a deliberate decision to replace family credit with working family tax credit, in order to take £1 billion from Government expenditure by reclassifying an element of a benefit as a tax credit. Its classification as tax forgone rather than expenditure wipes £1 billion, with one sweep of the pen, from the Government's accounts.

7.30 pm

The third element, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat–Amory) alluded, involves the debate about capital versus revenue, and about what those words mean. The Government have set great store by the introduction of the golden rule that states that they can borrow only to finance capital expenditure; but what is capital expenditure? My right hon. and hon. Friends have sought to discover the definition, but have been rebuffed by the Government in all quarters, because the Government cannot provide a definition enabling us to be certain about what they mean by capital.

Does a repair to a school, for example, count as revenue expenditure, or does it count as an improvement to the school, and therefore as capital? In the private sector, a repair is treated as revenue for accounting purposes, but, responding to a question, the Paymaster General said that it would depend on the level of repair. If the repair improved the building, it would be treated as capital; if it merely repaired the building, it would not. That is too uncertain a definition. We must have certainty in national accounts; we cannot allow such a level of subjectivity.

David Clementi, one of the Government's representatives on the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank of England, said in evidence to the Treasury Select Committee:

"It can be quite hard to decide what counts as investment and what is current expenditure."

It is difficult—which is why William Buiter, another member of the Monetary Policy Committee, has dismissed the golden rule altogether as a method of assessing the correct level of debt for a Government. In evidence to the Select Committee, he said that many countries that supposedly operate the golden rule—as Germany has to do under its constitution—find "creative accounting ways of emasculating it when this needs to be . . . you can always reclassify 'current' as 'capital' if you twist the arms of your accountants".

That is precisely what the Government are seeking to do. We have seen it with the ASB, and we are seeing it with the golden rule. The new clause would put into legislation a definition of what is capital and what is not—of what is debt and what is not.

The fourth area in which we have seen manipulation of the accounts is the guarantee. We saw it with the guarantee of the loan that the channel tunnel rail link consortium needs to finance the link—a £3.8 billion Government guarantee. Yes, it is a contingent liability; it has not been drawn down on the Government. But, even under the Government's current rules, in assessing whether an item ought to be included as a liability or debt, the Government must consider the level of risk. If the Government consider it sufficiently likely that the debt will be drawn down, under their current rules that debt will be regarded as part of Government debt.

In a parliamentary question, I asked about the guarantee. The Chief Secretary to the Treasury replied:

"The Government believe that the amount of finance required for the Channel Tunnel Rail Link is such that the financial markets would have been unable to provide the credit support which Government are to give."—[Official Report, 29 June 1998; Vol. 315, c.28.]

The Government are providing a guarantee, not to reduce the cost of finance, but to provide a loan that no one in the private sector is prepared to give. If that is not an admission that this is a very risky venture, I do not know what is. Even according to the Government's own current definition, they should include the channel tunnel rail link guarantee as part of debt.

We have seen four examples of the way in which the Government are manipulating the accounts. It is vital that that element is removed.

Mr. Love: The hon. Gentleman has referred to the difficulty and complexity of decisions of this type. He has mentioned the ASB and the Government. He will know that earlier this year, during discussions on the rules on a true and fair view, the ASB was able to persuade the Treasury to accept that element in the new accounts. Does he agree that such complex and difficult issues should be left to those who can negotiate and discuss them, rather than our trying to deal with them in a catch-all clause such as this?

Mr. Gibb: The "true and fair view" debate was about the Government's imposing on small businesses all the paraphernalia of statements of standard accounting procedures, which has never been done before. SSAP 9, for example, requires an element of overheads to be included in the valuation of stock. That imposes an unbearable burden on small businesses.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the ASB should not be bullied by Government. It should not be forced to change its principles and procedures simply to accommodate the Government's desire to shift debt from the balance sheet. That is why the new clause is so vital: it will give the world outside the Government—the City of London, and people who read Government accounts—certainty about what constitutes repair, what constitutes capital and what constitutes debt.

I hope that the Government will either accept the principle of the new clause, or set out the precise definitions of capital, revenue and what they regard as debt. I hope that they will also explain why the channel tunnel rail link guarantee of £3.8 billion is not being included in the balance sheet as a liability, notwithstanding the Chief Secretary's admission that it is such a risky venture that no one in the private sector would lend us money for it.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): It is difficult to see anything objectionable in the new clause. I consider it a matter of general public interest for the public accounts to feature as much transparency as possible. That is desirable not just for public scrutiny purposes, but because the markets increasingly require exacting standards in regard to both public and private borrowing.

I do not think, however, that we should become too excited. It is not at all clear that the new clause constitutes an enormous advance in our understanding of the problem of public debt. The real problem—as has been revealed by the crisis in Asia over the past year—is not the difference between guaranteed and non-guaranteed debt, but the difference between implicit and explicit debt. In Asia, enormous amounts in private loans have been raised by private agents, and the markets chose not to believe that those were purely private transactions. There was an implicit assumption that the Governments would underwrite them. Similarly, the British economy has a large amount of implicit debt that is not guaranteed, and would never be picked up by a measure of this kind.

I am sure that Conservative Members are well aware of an obvious instance. I refer to the legacy of privatisation of the utilities. If, for example, a highly geared water utility were to make itself insolvent as a result of mismanagement, it is difficult to believe that the Government of the day—whatever their politics—would allow taps to be turned off for months on end while the question whether guarantees were implicit or explicit, and the relationship with creditors, were sorted out. It would be a Government responsibility to act immediately, and an implicit guarantee would be associated with that utility because it was a utility. Simply having explicit guarantees does not take us forward very far. Inevitably, there is a vast murky area in which the Government effectively underwrite the liabilities of large parts of the private sector.

None the less, the new clause has taken us forward a little. It also enables us to raise a few more fundamental questions about what the Government hope to achieve with their debt objectives. In a sense, they have only themselves to blame for the fact that they are now being caned for a lack of precision on debt, because they have chosen to elevate their public debt target to such a high level.

It is not clear why public debt has become such an obsession for them. It can be seen from the latest relative public-debt ratios achieved by countries in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development that we have a lower gross debt ratio to gross domestic product than any other G7 country—lower even than the United States—and that our net debt-to-GDP ratio, which we are now targeting, is lower than that of any other OECD country except Japan, which has the special problems of pension funding. We do not have a seriously aging population, so why is there this preoccupation with public debt?

The Government's reasoning is that they have a problem with interest payments, but the reason why we have an interest problem on public debt is because of the extremely high rate of interest on long-term debt, which is the highest in the G7. That is in large part because of the inflation expectations of the market, which now rates Britain as a greater inflation risk than Italy; it has done so for some time, not just under this Government. Therefore, the issue about public debt seems to have been grossly inflated.

I should like to pose one question, and I hope that the Minister will deal with it in his answers. What is the implication—the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) has already touched on this—of the two rules that the Government have set for themselves: the golden rule and the public debt rule? How do those two things interact?

At first sight, the golden rule is—I disagree with the hon. Gentleman on this—sensible. It provides for balanced budgeting, but allows the Government to borrow up to whatever the limits are in terms of viable projects producing a good social return, but the question arises: supposing the Government do follow the golden rule and borrow heavily for good, useful public sector projects and that drives public debt upwards, how do the Government reconcile what would then be inconsistent objectives? What takes priority—the golden rule or the debt target, and why should the golden rule be overridden if there were a particular worry about public debt that is created by good public sector projects?

I pose that question, which might seem a little academic, in the context of two specific industries: the Post Office and the London Underground. Those are two good examples of seriously under-capitalised utilities that clearly need to borrow substantial amounts for investment. It would almost certainly be economically sensible for them to do so. It would produce good returns for the public sector. In our view and in, I think, that of most Labour Members, they should remain within the public sector, so why should they not borrow, and why would it matter if that drove up to a modest level the debt-to-GDP ratio?

I thank Conservative Members for raising this issue; it does seem important. I do not think that they take us enormously far forward, but this seems a useful addition to the collection of statistics. Perhaps it is a good opportunity to help the Minister to take us a little forward in debating his thinking on public debt management.

Mr. Flight: The new clause is extremely important because it airs an issue, in a changing world, about which Governments, of both political complexions, have scarcely thought. In the past, the general principle has been that any material liabilities that were being guaranteed should be covered by the reserves, but I think it is correct to say that there have not been clear rules on the matter to date.

The issue is important for the reasons referred to by the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb). As we move out of an age in which much—particularly in the utility and other sectors—was within the Government sector anyway, and into an age of many more private finance initiative deals and many more Government-private partnerships, it is inevitable that the amounts that are explicitly guaranteed by Government will grow—before we even reach the more difficult issue of what is implicitly underwritten by Government.

The new clause makes the explicit, transparent requirement that anything that is guaranteed by Government, Government agency or body related to Government, should be included within the national debt total. That could logically be interpreted as meaning that two different lots of figures should be produced: the national debt total ex such guarantees, and the national debt total cum such guarantees, with such liabilities as have been guaranteed potentially being classified by their assessed risk.

The Government's present posture seems to be somewhat cavalier, particularly in relation to the £3.8 billion-worth of London and Continental Railways bonds that have been guaranteed. I believe that I am correct in saying that the view of the Deputy Prime Minister was, "There is less than a 20 per cent. chance that the liability will be called, so forget it." That is not at all adequate, for the reasons to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton drew attention. Whatever the risk, the money could not have been raised without that Government guarantee. If the Government are going to move forward with their private sector partnerships and with PFI activities, the issue is going to come up much more.

As has been pointed out, this touches on wider issues—for example, what do the Government mean by their definition of the factors underlying the golden rule? It is also correct to make comparisons with the private sector. As has been pointed out, in looking at a bank's capital adequacy, contingent liabilities, where guarantees have been given, have to be taken into account. In relation to any other financial services business that has capital adequacy requirements, the same is true, although, interestingly, contingent liabilities are given weightings, depending on the degree of risk involved.

This is an issue in regard to which there may be scope for pan-European clarification. Certainly, the statistics that are kept by the countries of Europe—indeed, by EU member states—seem to be all over the place. If this country simply ignores this important issue, we move into what I refer to as Italian-Franco territories. Much though I love both countries, they are notorious for fiddling their national statistics, so that we do not know what the real situation is.

I was astonished to discover that the famous Italian debt ratio, on which the whole of the EMU went ahead, is not, in fact, based on the official Italian national income—the national income has been inflated by an estimate of Italy's black economy, thus serving to reduce the debt ratio from what would otherwise be about 150 per cent. to close to 110 per cent. I repeat: there is much to be said for having pan-European, agreed rules on what Government statistics should comprise, what should be published and what the divisors for certain ratios should be.

The hon. Member for Twickenham rightly raised the important issue of implicit as well as explicit potential liabilities. I think that it is impossible to define rules for the quantification of that, but it is a fair point that, in relation to the problems in Asia, the expectation that there was implicit Government support has been an important cause of some of those problems. The point at issue is not so much the explicit wording of the new clause as the fact that there need to be agreed, clear rules on this issue. Pan-European rules would be useful in enabling us to understand the true financial situation of all EU member states.

In addition to dealing with the extent to which Governments' liabilities that have been guaranteed should be set down and there should be transparency, the new clause raises the issue of future unfunded Government liabilities, which should also be explicitly quantified. What are the unfunded pension liabilities of Germany? What are the potential liabilities of the UK's national insurance arrangements? Without such data, any comparison of economies is meaningless.

Given the combination of the change in definition from the public sector borrowing requirement to the public sector net cash requirement; the issue of how to define capital and current expenditure to implement the golden rule; and the wider issue of whether we are going to organise expenditure wholly within the state sector or within private and state allowances, I fear that the Government are deliberately seeking to ensure that the statistics can be manipulated to suit whatever story they want to be told. The current economic situation means that that is easier to do than it has been in the past.

I strongly support the new clause and all that goes with it. If the Government do not accept it, I hope that they will come forward with sensible proposals on how the true figures of our national accounts can be recorded, and on the possibility of having a pan-European standard.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I, too, welcome this debate. Viewers of the parliamentary channel may be debating whether they dare switch over to watch the match at 8 pm. We are debating a vital issue that will affect all our futures, so I hope that viewers will stay with us.

As this is a debate about the national debt, I should like to put to rest once and for all the canard that we have heard so often from Labour Members—I hope that we will not hear it again tonight—that the previous Government doubled the national debt. That is totally misleading. The previous Government halved the national debt in their first 10 years in office.

I am grateful to the authors of the Chancellor's fiscal strategy report for pointing out that, during the first 10 years of the previous Government, the level of debt fell from 49 to 27 per cent. of gross domestic product. It is true that, in the following recession, it rose again to 45 per cent. of GDP, but that was still below the level that we inherited from the profligate previous Labour Government. However, there was a benefit even there, because one of the effects of the recession, difficult though that period was, was that it delivered a very low sustainable rate of inflation and, with that, a much lower rate of Government borrowing on Government bonds, of which, of course, this Government have been the beneficiary. This Government really did have a golden inheritance. Unfortunately, not all that glitters is gold.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): The spectre of the golden legacy stirred me into action again. If the legacy was so golden, what explanation would the hon. Gentleman give to his constituents of the £25 billion used to pay interest charges on the national debt which still hang around the necks of all taxpayers in this country? Does he not realise that many people feel that the previous Government should be surcharged for such profligacy?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am surprised that the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) is not embarrassed by his own question. At this stage in the previous economic cycle, the Conservative Government repaid Government debt and reduced Government interest charges. This Government have changed their tune within a year of being in office and have no intention of repaying a single pound of debt. The debt is going up year on year. That will be the tarnished legacy that we will inherit in a few years' time. The Paymaster General may smile, but we have to ask what the golden rule means.

I re-examined the figures in the Chancellor's report. It is interesting that capital expenditure under the last Labour Government accounted for more than four fifths of the level of their borrowing. We all know that borrowing under that Labour Government was at an absurdly high and unsustainable level, yet most of it was what this Government would call capital expenditure and would therefore come close to their golden rule. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) pointed out, it is no wonder that the golden rule is next to meaningless when it comes to judging how truly prudent a Government have been.

We have heard about the bonds in respect of the new rail link to the channel tunnel. Only this morning, the Financial Times pointed out how imprudent it is of the Government not even to count that guarantee as a contingent liability, let alone subject it to the more rigorous system that we are proposing, whereby the sum would be stated up front, as it were, on the Government's balance sheet.

Let us consider the Export Credits Guarantee Department. We all support the idea of guarantees for exports. It is a thoroughly sound idea, and it underpins the strength of the economy that we bequeathed to the present Government. However, there is always room to consider the cost of what we are doing for exports. If we know the true figures, we can get clearer information and a better idea of that cost.

Of course, there is a cost associated with all the guarantees that the Government are giving. They mean that the paper in the market is effectively Government paper. As we know, the more Government paper there is in the market, the higher will be the cost of raising additional funds for the Government. There is a cost to all taxpayers for the guarantee of the channel tunnel link funding, and that cost will be in the form of higher interest rates or all Government debt. Again, the hon. Member for Shipley should have been too embarrassed to get out of his seat.

My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) alluded to another problem. I am grateful to the Library for coming up with some information from the International Monetary Fund on pension fund liabilities. The IMF report states:

"For many industrial countries, net pension liabilities exceed current overall national debt."

In fact, in Japan, Germany and France—according to the IMF figures—the level of unfunded pension debt alone is more than 100 per cent. of GDP. In other words, as my hon. Friends have said, there are myriad ways of measuring the obligations of Governments.

We should not be blinded by the fact that the Minister will no doubt allude to the Maastricht definition. The Maastricht definition makes no reference to the level of unfunded pension liabilities which are so high in Germany and France but which, according to the same report, are less than 5 per cent. of GDP in this country. There is a dramatic difference between the strong Government debt position inherited by the Labour Government and that in any other country in Europe—and, indeed, in almost any other country in the world.

The new clause is simple and would have a very clear effect. Above all, if the Government accepted it, it would show that they took their liabilities seriously. It would show that they did count the cost, and merely by demonstrating that, would go some way to mitigating the profligacy that we have already witnessed on the part of the Government, in respect not only of the channel tunnel funding but of student loans.

[Mr. St. Aubyn]

By the end of this Parliament, there will not only be £3.5 billion-worth of guarantees of channel tunnel funding but about £6.5 billion-worth of student loans guaranteed by the Government. That debt will be in the market, and the Government are ultimately responsible for it. The Government are using guarantees as a way to supplement their borrowing powers in every way they can. In the process, they are undermining the very claims to prudence set out in the report that we received from the Chancellor earlier this month.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): New clause 7 is a clear example of Conservative Members' financial illiteracy. The obvious point about the £400 billion national debt has already been made in this debate, as has the point about the cost of paying for that debt. The basic point that I want to make is one of financial literacy—that a contingent liability is not borrowing.

The Export Credits Guarantee Department has been mentioned in the debate. In simple terms, that department gives a guarantee—to Midland Bank, for example—to underpin a credit facility for an exporter, who in 99 per cent. of cases will later be paid by an importer. Therefore, that contingent liability never becomes borrowing. The idea of including such a liability on the balance sheet is therefore wrong. It is a situation in which a contingent liability never becomes a debt.

8 pm

I can see the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) thinking about that, and about the fact that it is facile and stupid to include contingent liabilities with borrowing. That liability will not become debt, although it is risk.

Mr. St. Aubyn rose—

Mr. Flight rose—

Dr. Cable: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davies: I shall give way in a moment.

We therefore cannot simply club together those items, which are apples and pears. A comparison of that prescription with private sector practices, in companies and in balance sheets, would reveal that—although a company would have company borrowing on its balance sheet—a contingent liability, such as a guarantee to an associated company, would be in the footnotes of the accounts and not in the balance sheet. The reason for the practice is that that contingent liability may not be realised as a borrowing or debt obligation.

The Government issue Treasury bills and are obliged to pay for them; that is borrowing. Conversely, if they give various guarantees but there is no real prospect of having to pay out on them—a contingent guarantee—it would be completely irrational to add contingent liabilities to actual borrowing to come up with a concept of debt.

Therefore, new clause 7 underlines a fundamental misunderstanding of public accounts.

Several hon. Members rose—

Dr. Cable rose—

Mr. Davies: I wonder why, if the new clause is such a good idea, the previous Government did not introduce such a measure during their 18 years in office. There seems to be a whole queue of hon. Members waiting to get involved in the debate.

Dr. Cable: Does the hon. Gentleman include the World bank in his definition of financial illiteracy? As a matter of course, that bank regards publicly guaranteed private debt as part of external public debt for the 130 countries that it reviews.

Mr. Davies: I was simply saying that one cannot combine borrowing with contingent liability and come up with a figure. No one is saying that we should not assess the level of the Government's exposure to risk. If one has, for example, a credit guarantee for £100 million here and one for £100 million there, and if one of them is a very highly geared, high-risk guarantee whereas the other is as safe as houses, we simply cannot add together the two and produce a meaningful figure. The idea that we can then add on to that figure an actual borrowing liability is ridiculous.

Those who tabled new clause 7 are trying to suggest that we should enrich our understanding with a more detailed breakdown of the different types of our exposure—which would include the private finance initiative, for example. If that were really the objective of the new clause, we would be having quite a different debate. However, it is facile seriously to expect the House to pass such a simplistic new clause.

Mr. St. Aubyn: It is evident that both a guarantee and a loan are a use of credit and a use of the Government's good name. They are very similar uses of credit, and we therefore need a common measure of both of them.

Mr. Davies: That is ridiculous. If the Government borrow money, they borrow money and have an obligation to repay it, underpinned by taxpayers' money. Conversely, it is a quite different kettle of fish if they give a guarantee covering, for example, a credit failure by an exporter, or by an importer to pay an exporter in a foreign market. If the hon. Gentleman cannot understand that difference, he should not have served on the Committee considering the Bill.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): I had not planned on speaking in this debate, but was inspired to do so by the final remarks of the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies). He said that borrowing is borrowing—which I totally agree with—but he should speak to the Chancellor of the Exchequer about that. The Chancellor has invented a new definition of borrowing, which is that it has to be related to capital expenditure and not to current expenditure.

I caught only the end of the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn), when he mentioned the golden rule. The golden rule is constantly being mentioned—I think mistakenly—as some act of great prudence.

Mr. Geraint Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Michael Spicer: I shall finish these comments—I might forget them—and then I shall certainly give way.

The golden rule breaks the point that the hon. Member for Croydon, Central made about borrowing being borrowing. It is quite wrong to try to disguise that fact.

Secondly, somehow or other, the golden rule has been used as some type of fig leaf for prudence. Yesterday, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury argued in the House with my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) about evidence given by Professor Buiter—one of the members of the Monetary Policy Committee—to the Treasury Select Committee, of which I am a member. Professor Buiter argued effectively—for very much the same reasons given by the hon. Member for Croydon, Central—that the golden rule was rubbish. The Chief Secretary said that that was not quite true, because the Government were actually interested in prudence. However, prudence—which is related to a second completely false conception, that I shall deal with now that I am speaking in the debate—is meaningless.

It is mistaken to argue that the golden rule, which is a new definition of borrowing, is somehow more prudent than a belief—as the hon. Member for Croydon, Central seemed to argue—that all borrowing is related to prudence.

Mr. Davies: I should like to make it clear that the golden rule is not a definition of borrowing, but a prescription for sound and prudent financial management. One borrows only against capital investment and not to pay for consumption. That is very sensible practice and is not a definition of borrowing. We all know that borrowing is simply taking money and spending it on whatever. The golden rule is a quite different proposition. I commend and support wholeheartedly the Chancellor's actions on debt management, the golden rule and separating capital and revenue. However, I completely reject new clause 7.

Sir Michael Spicer: I think that the hon. Gentleman and I agree on some points. The problem is that, as a definition of prudence, the golden rule is not a very good one. All precedent in public spending has shown that any increase in capital spending is usually accompanied by a pretty massive current expenditure commitment, even if it is argued that it is for capital expenditure. The relationship between capital expenditure and current expenditure has been well established as an economic concept.

Mr. Davies: Surely the point is that the revenue costs of capital investment should be paid from revenue and not from borrowing. One can borrow to invest in capital expenditure. Although there will be a knock-on revenue cost, that should be paid for out of tax. The points are quite consistent.

Sir Michael Spicer: As the hon. Gentleman said, all borrowing is borrowing. The fact is that there is not such a thing as "distinct borrowing for capital expenditure" that can somehow be identified as different from borrowing for current expenditure, in terms not only of prudence, but of practical fact.

I do not understand why there is such a fuss about the new clause. I should say, partly in response to a comment by the hon. Member for Croydon, Central, that one of the reasons why the previous Government did not make such practices particularly explicit is that there was never any doubt that attaching some type of public sector guarantee—as there would be, for example, if a company had a Government stake of more than 50 per cent. as some form of guarantee and, therefore, there was a distortion in how it was allowed to borrow in the market—should attract the application of public sector borrowing requirement rules.

Mr. Hammond: Does my hon. Friend agree that the hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) fails to see that almost all borrowing by public bodies could be replaced by private sector borrowing with the backing of a Government guarantee? Therefore, his position is ludicrous. The Government could wipe hundreds of millions of pounds off the PSBR at a stroke. That is why guarantees and borrowing are similar in their effect.

Sir Michael Spicer: That is certainly a very important point. Another important principle, which I thought was shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House, was that if any institution, corporate or otherwise, entered the market for money with the backing of a Government guarantee, not only would it have the effect that my hon. Friend has just mentioned, but it would be highly distorting and very unfair to others in the marketplace borrowing at their own risk. It is a fundamental principle and until now, it seemed unnecessary to spell it out in legislation.

However, a number of initiatives and pronouncements by the new Government and some of the spins that have been put on them suggest that, for instance, they might be prepared for a company with a 49 per cent. private shareholding and a 51 per cent. Government shareholding to borrow in a way that ignored the PSBR rules, that was outside the definition of public sector borrowing and that unfairly distorted the borrowing process. The fact that such a prospect is in the political air makes it necessary to spell out exactly what fits into public sector borrowing—not only by means of figures, but in respect of any potential distortion in the capital markets, which are highly important and should not under any circumstances be neglected.

The fact that, apparently, we have a new ethos, makes it suddenly necessary to spell out exactly what is within the PSBR rules and what is not. We have not had to do so in the past because no Conservative Government would have dreamed of breaking the rules. We know that to distort the marketplace in such a way would be not only unfair, but disruptive and inefficient in terms of the best use of capital. In future, however, such a definition may well be needed. The more that Labour Members talk about no premium being attached to borrowing by people who have some guarantee—either because of a public sector majority shareholding or through another guarantee—the more it becomes necessary in terms of equity and the most efficient distribution of capital.

Unless the Government can guarantee that there is no question of there being any distortion or any public sector guarantee leading to the PSBR rules being broken, the new clause is absolutely essential as part of the new regime.

8.15 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: I should make two declarations of interest. First, I am not an accountant and secondly, I have an interest in football, so I hope that we shall make some progress on what is a particularly arcane issue.

[Mr. Geoffrey Robinson]

The Opposition appear to be developing a new leitmotif along the lines that, under Labour, the Inland Revenue has taken much greater licence in secondary legislation—although the figures show that the same occurred as much if not more, and on equally vital issues, under previous Tory Administrations. They are also developing the line that there has been some weakening in the standards of our national accounts classification rules. The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) mentioned other countries fiddling their figures. I shall ensure that his remarks are brought to the attention of the Governments of the appropriate countries where, no doubt, he will be a welcome visitor this summer. However, in our case the rules have not changed.

Some Opposition Members are succumbing to what could be described as professional recidivism. In a sense we appear to be turning into accountants instead of legislators. We made it clear in Standing Committee that we could not accept a proposal along the lines of new clause 7, as it would make the Chancellor and the Government of the day accountable to the law courts, with all that that would involve, instead of to the people of this country, as we intend to remain the case.

Mr. Hammond: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Robinson: I shall give way in a moment. I sense that the hon. Gentleman does not share my interest in making progress.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) asked what was so wrong with building up a high level of borrowing. We would prefer a prudent level, and he should bear in mind that one cannot get complacent about borrowing. In one year—the pre-Budget year of 1992—the Conservative Government increased the PSBR by £50 billion. When we took office, the interest burden was about £25 billion a year, which is more than we spend on schools and hospitals. Having said that, if we are to invest prudently for the future, we must stick to the golden rule and balance the books over the economic cycle in revenue terms. If the burden of that investment in the future is paid for in future by those for whom we are investing—our children—it has a certain fairness and symmetry.

The hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) repeatedly asks how we deal with repairs and what is the difference between substantial repairs and additions. The right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) gave us quite a good definition. He said that repairs to schools were usually paid for out of revenue, but that substantial additions or improvements were partly capitalised. It is a normal accounting process. We are in no way trying to understate the need for capital investment or the required level of capital investment. We realise only too clearly the great neglect there has been under previous Governments of all colours. When there is a cash problem, the immediate solution is to cut back on capital spending and keep going on revenue. That results in under-investment in services such as London Underground, to which the hon. Member for Twickenham referred. It is clear from the current state of affairs that there has been under-investment throughout the public sector, which is a crying shame.

Several Opposition Members raised the same two or three issues, so I shall not reply to them individually. In respect of the channel tunnel rail link, instead of admitting that it was a complete mess from the beginning, having been pushed through with bad financial arrangements and for political reasons by the former Deputy Prime Minister, and saying, "We made a mess of it; thank goodness the Labour Government have managed to get it back on the rails and make a success of it," they are attempting to say that we are doing something wrong.

The Government guarantee was examined by the Office for National Statistics, which then decided not to include it as a contingent liability. Opposition Members may disagree with the ONS; from time to time, no doubt they will. It is true that we are using the financial reporting standard—on the exposure draft. We are having a vigorous debate with Professor Tweedie and his colleagues and are trying to reach an agreement. However, that is not unusual for Governments. The idea that we are doing things that are more risqué—bending the rules and twisting the interpretations further than would be reasonable—is quite wrong.

The Conservatives hate the fact that we have found a way in which to make a success of the PFI. We have done more in our first year than they did in the previous five years. Apart from the channel tunnel rail link, which was a flop, they achieved hardly anything. We have made a success of the idea organisationally and practically. Building programmes on a Victorian scale for schools and hospitals are under way because we have got the PFI right within a year, after the Conservatives spent five years messing around and getting nowhere.

That puts the CTRL and the PFI into context. We are examining ways in which to strengthen the role of the ONS and the National Audit Office. The normal accounting principles continue as before. We have not changed anything; we have been far too busy for that. Instead of congratulating the Government on moving towards welfare tax reform—a major reform that the Conservatives did nothing about in all their years of power, except intensifying dependency—

Mr. St. Aubyn rose—

Mr. Robinson: I shall give way in a moment. If I am being unreasonable, I hope that hon. Members will understand. I should like to make progress if possible.

The Government are getting on with their plans and succeeding. Our golden rule is well understood in the country. We want a prudent level of debt, and we are publishing our code of fiscal stability. That is what is necessary. The new clause would merely make the Chancellor report through the courts for his actions and result in the Government's economic policies being judged by lawyers, who, for all their immense contribution to our national well-being, are not cut out for that role. We cannot accept the new clause. I hope that good sense will prevail all round and that the Opposition will not press the issue to a vote.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The purpose of the new clause was to get some assurances from the Government that they would respect the ground rules in the presentation of the national accounts. The Paymaster General's response added to our alarm. However, we do not intend to divide the House. We are aware that there is a football match taking place somewhere else and we would not wish some team or other to score when we are otherwise engaged. Hon. Members in all parts of the Palace can relax on that score.

We had hoped for some assurances. We are fully aware that the Government have two fiscal rules, which they are proud of. We wanted to know how the rules will be policed. The golden rule is all very well, and supposedly ensures that the Government borrow only for capital expenditure. If that is the case, it is important that the Government maintain discipline in allocating expenditure to capital or revenue. There might be a natural temptation for them to allocate expenditure to capital so that they can claim to be keeping to the golden rule while letting expenditure increase almost without limit. That is why we have asked some routine questions about whether the Government will keep to normal accounting rules.

The Paymaster General has given us some assurances. His understanding of the distinction between repairs and improvements is familiar. That makes it all the odder that, when asked the same question, the Chief Secretary gave an evasive reply that amounted to little more than, "We will make up the rules as we go along." That is why we were suspicious. The Paymaster General at least gave us an outline assurance.

The second discipline is that the Government say that they will keep a limit on debt as a proportion of gross domestic product, but there is another possible fudge on that. They can reclassify debt as private rather than national debt, even if it is guaranteed by the Government, who retain all the risk. That would be a clear evasion. The Paymaster General said that the private finance initiative was now a great success. It is easy to make a success of the idea if all the risk remains with the Treasury.

As the Register of Members' Interests shows, I am a director of two companies. My fellow directors and I will take on any PFI project, borrowing enormous sums and undertaking any Government contract, if the Treasury guarantees the loan and all the risk remains with the Government. It is easy to make a success of PFI if the Government take the borrowing off their balance sheet, but retain the risk. That is the problem that we were attempting to explore and that would be prevented by the new clause.

Sir Michael Spicer: Is not what my right hon. Friend is saying particularly important in the context of the Government's macro-policy on public spending, bearing in mind that public spending may go through the roof—or at least go considerably higher than we had planned? If the Government do not raise taxes, they will have to fudge public sector borrowing, as my right hon. Friend is saying. Those are issues of the highest importance.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend is right. Our request is simply that the published projections and the national accounts should give a true and genuine picture of the state of borrowing. My hon. Friend is familiar with the problem in other countries that have huge contingent liabilities that are not disclosed.

My hon. Friend made a notable speech in the debate on the convergence criteria and the single currency. Several of us observed that it was risky for the single European currency to start when the constituent economies did not show the true extent of public borrowing. Italy, for example, has a gigantic unfunded public pensions liability, which amounts to little more than a hope that a future generation of taxpayers will honour the promises made by the Italian Government today. We have contrasted that with the happy position in this country, where the majority of pension liabilities are represented by assets that are audited and are a visible expression of where future pensioners can expect to have their pensions paid from.

The reliability of public accounts is very important, not just domestically but in international comparisons. We are not satisfied with the way in which the Paymaster General has dealt with the issue. We shall return to it on another occasion. We greatly regret the fact that a new clause tabled in a positive and constructive spirit has not found favour, but we know that we have won the argument. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 8

STAMP DUTY ON TRANSFERS OF LAND TO DEALERS IN OR DEVELOPERS OF LAND

'.—Where a transfer of land to a dealer or developer of land takes place and the instrument effecting that transfer is liable to stamp duty at the rate specified in either subsection (1)(d) or subsection(1)(e) of section 55 of the Finance Act 1963 and the dealer in or developer of land intends either:—

(a) to transfer to an unconnected third party the same parcel of land within six months without improvement or,

(b) to develop the land and transfer to third parties or dedicate to the highway every part of the land within a period of two years from the date of transfer

he may indicate such intention by notice in writing to the Inland Revenue and provided that in the case of (a) above the land is so transferred within six months and the instrument effecting the transfer is duly stamped within the time allowed by statute for such purpose and evidence of such is produced by him to the Inland Revenue, or in the case of (b) above the land is developed (within the meaning of the Town and Country Planning Act 1947) and every part of the land is so transferred or dedicated to the highway within two years of the date of transfer and the instrument or instruments effecting such transfer or transfers are duly stamped within the time allowed by statute for such purpose and evidence of such is produced by him to the Inland Revenue, then the Inland Revenue shall repay to him the full amount of the stamp duty paid by him on transfer of the land to him.'.—[Mr. Whittingdale.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 45, in clause 147, page 137, line 14, after '£500,000', insert

'in the case of a transfer of a dwelling house or £5,000,000 in the case of any other transfer'.

No. 70, in page 137, line 15, leave out

'for "£1.50" there shall be substituted "£2"'

and insert—

'(a) for "£1.50" there shall be substituted "£1 for every £100 or part of £100 of the consideration up to £250,000, and at a rate of £2" and

(b) after "consideration" there shall be inserted "in excess of £250,000".'.

No. 71, in page 137, line 16, leave out

'for "£2" there shall be substituted' "£3"'

and insert—

Mr. Whittingdale: I realise that this is perhaps not the most opportune moment at which to be moving a new clause. I accept that there are other distractions, and I hope that the attendance in the Chamber does not denote the fact that hon. Members do not regard this as an important matter—it is an important matter on which we should spend a little time.

The purpose of the new clause is to provide a measure of relief to dealers or developers of land who will be worst hit by the Government's swingeing increase in stamp duty. It is worth remembering that this is the second substantial increase in stamp duty since the Government came to power. The last Conservative Government significantly reduced the impact of stamp duty by abolishing it on the transaction of shares, and by substantially raising the value of properties on which it became payable.

Within a few months of the election of the Government, the Chancellor chose to increase stamp duty by 50 per cent., from 1 per cent. to 1.5 per cent. on property sales above £250,000, and by 100 per cent., to 2 per cent., on property sales above £500,000. At that time, the Chancellor said that the measure was necessary to reduce volatility in the housing market. He said in his Budget statement last year:

"I will not allow house prices to get out of control and put at risk the sustainability of the recovery. I have therefore decided that it is right to take measures aimed at stability in the housing market."—[Official Report, 2 July 1997; Vol. 297, c. 313.]

As we said at the time, that had little to do with stability in the housing market. It was a spurious excuse for what was, plain and simple, a tax rise.

Mr. Swayne: Has my hon. Friend considered the possibility of a wider agenda, in that the Chancellor may be seeking to attack our fondness for owning properties—particularly housing—because that is one of the principal causes of our economic cycle being out of sync with the rest of the European norm?

8.30 pm

Mr. Whittingdale: My hon. Friend makes a good point. There is a real concern that this is not the last such increase that we shall see. The levels of stamp duty elsewhere in Europe are considerably above those in this country, and that may not be unconnected with the fact that we have much higher levels of house ownership.

Nine months later, in the second Budget of this Administration, the Chancellor abandoned his previous attempts to justify rises in stamp duty on economic grounds. In the Budget in April, the Chancellor increased stamp duty again to 2 per cent. on property sales above £250,000, and to 3 per cent. on property sales of more than £500,000. At that time, he made no mention of the need for stability in the housing market. The only justification that the Chancellor was prepared to offer was that 98 per cent. of house transactions would be unaffected.

The implication of that statement was clear—this would be a tax increase affecting only the rich living in expensive houses. The truth, as we have sought to show, is different. The real burden of the tax rise does not fall on a few rich house owners who, it might be argued, can afford to pay. The real burden falls on the commercial sector of businesses and on those who invest in properties. It is hardly surprising that the Institute of Directors said:

"We deplore the increases in stamp duty on high-value properties. While very few house purchases will be affected, a far higher proportion of purchases of business premises (and of goodwill and patents) will be affected. Insurance companies, pension funds and property unit trusts will bear the brunt of the direct impact of increases in stamp duty, because most commercial properties are owned by such investors and then leased. The millions of people who invest in insurance, pensions and unit trusts will therefore suffer."

it is to meet that concern that we have tabled amendment no. 45, which deals with that point by restricting the £500,000 limit to the transfer of a dwelling house, and applying a £5 million limit to other transfers.

Moreover, the effect of the increase in stamp duty is likely to be highly distorting. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) has pointed out, stamp duty is imposed on a slab system, not a slice system. As a result, if a property sells for £249,999, stamp duty is payable at the lower rate of 1 per cent. However, if its price increases by £1, stamp duty becomes payable on the entire amount. As the Chartered Institute of Taxation has pointed out, at the £250,000 limit the duty on an additional £1 of consideration will lead to an additional amount due of £2,502—thus giving a marginal rate of duty of 2,502 per cent. At the £500,000 limit, the marginal rate for the extra pound of consideration is 5,003 per cent.

For all those reasons, we would much rather that the increases in duty did not take place. The purpose of new clause 8 is to seek to provide at least some protection for those who will be among the hardest hit. The Chancellor attempted to claim that 98 per cent. of house transactions would be unaffected by the increase, but that is simply not the case. Like many hon. Members, I suspect, I have seen substantial developments of new estates in my constituency in recent years. A large proportion of house sales are conducted by those buying new houses from builders and developers.

Although few of those individual transactions may amount to more than £250,000, the original purchase by the developer of the land almost certainly does amount to more than that. In most cases, developers will buy land for building in parcels worth considerably more than £500,000, and the additional cost to the developer of the increase in stamp duty is simply likely to be passed on in higher prices of the homes which he then goes on to sell. The result is that the tax increase will hit far more than 2 per cent. of house transactions.

The measure is likely to fuel house price inflation and will add to the cost of many first-time buyers and those starting a family who wish to move to a bigger home. In many cases, the value of the purchase will be far less than £250,000, but nevertheless the buyers are likely to be paying more as a direct result of the measure imposed by the Chancellor.

On top of that, developers and those who buy houses from them will have to pay stamp duty twice. It will be charged on the original purchase of land by the developer and it will then be paid again by those who come to buy properties from the developer. In Committee, the Paymaster General moved new clause 10, which was to provide for relief from double stamp duties. That measure was made necessary by the repeal of the Government of Ireland Act 1920, and was a sensible measure to ensure that people did not have to pay stamp duty twice as a result of the repeal of that Act.

In this instance, the consequence may well be that people will have to pay stamp duty twice. They will pay it indirectly through the increased cost of their homes, because the developer has had to pay it. They will then pay it again, directly, on the cost of the house that they purchase. That is serious enough at the present rates, but our fear is that it will become more serious if stamp duty increases again. In his two Budgets so far, we have seen the Chancellor's willingness to use stamp duty as a means of increasing tax and revenue.

As my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) pointed out, we have a far higher level of home ownership and far lower levels of stamp duty than exist on the continent. I should be interested to know whether it is the Government's intention to have further increases in stamp duty in coming Budgets, and whether there might be an agenda to move towards a harmonisation of stamp duty levels across Europe. I am glad to see the Financial Secretary in her place. She has a particular interest in harmonisation, and I should be interested to hear whether that future harmonisation is under consideration.

As I said, the effect of the amendments is not to remove the increase—although, ideally, that is what we should like—but to remove the increased cost of stamp duty from developers and restrict it to the sale of houses worth over £250,000. It is the Chancellor's declared intention that people selling such properties should have to pay it. If the Paymaster General wants to ensure that the measure applies only to those people, who were specifically mentioned by the Chancellor when he introduced the measure in the Budget, he should accept our amendments.

Mr. Hammond: I declare an interest in this matter, which is included in the Register of Members' Interests, in that I am a director of a small house-building and development company. I speak to the new clause not because I expect personally to benefit from the proposed change. As my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) ably pointed out, the developer or dealer will not ultimately bear the incidence of this potential double taxation; the end purchaser will inevitably pay this tax.

Until the two Budgets under this Government, stamp duty was largely an irritant to people in the property development business and those buying and selling houses. At 1 per cent. on properties over £60,000, it had to be paid, but was not likely to be a determinant of people's behaviour in their transactions. Stamp duty on transfers of land valued at above £500,000 is now levied at 3 per cent. and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford has pointed out—I know that the Paymaster General has acknowledged this problem—we have the slab, rather than the slice, system. That produces ludicrously high marginal rates of taxation, which create artificial distortions in the property market and effectively make it certain that no house will ever be sold for £249,000 or £499,000. Anything that introduces artificial distortions into the market is greatly to be deplored.

As my hon. Friend said, when the measure was announced in the Budget speech, the Chancellor led the public to believe that it applied only to houses and then only to the houses of the few. The purpose of the new clause is to draw attention to the fact that land at every stage in the cycle of transactions will be subject to the stamp duty. To describe the effect at its simplest, a £1 million parcel of land that is sold to a developer will attract stamp duty at 3 per cent., which is a levy of £30,000. That land might be used to build low-cost housing units, which would sell for less than £60,000. People who bought those houses might think that they had escaped the Chancellor's attack on the tax-paying public because they were paying no stamp duty. However, the price of the house that they bought, as determined by the developer, would inevitably include the cost of the 3 per cent. stamp duty on the land which he had been obliged to bear.

Typically across the UK, land makes up something like a third of the price of new houses. The measure will be unequal in its impact because in certain parts of the UK, such as London—which is the most extreme example—and the south-east, high land values mean that land can represent a much higher percentage of the price of a property. In London, land could represent as much as three quarters of the value of a property. It does not take a mathematician to work out that if land is bought subject to a 3 per cent. stamp duty and dwellings are built on it which are then sold for over £500,000 each, which is not unusual in central London, the ultimate incidence of stamp duty in the final purchase price could easily amount to 5 per cent. We must ask the Government openly to acknowledge that, with stamp duty being charged on every step of the transaction, multiple tiers of stamp duty will be included in the end price.

As I said earlier, at 1 per cent., stamp duty was an irritant and did not cause major concern, but at 3 per cent. it becomes a significant factor. As my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford made clear, it has an impact not only on houses but on factories, shops, offices and any kind of development or property that is bought and sold in the marketplace. Where land is purchased and then developed, our new clause would reduce the phenomenon of double dipping.

8.45 pm

The Chancellor said in his 1997 Budget speech that he had increased stamp duty to control inflation in the housing market. As my hon. Friend noted, he did not make a similar comment in the 1998 Budget speech when he increased stamp duty on larger transactions. Will the Paymaster General tell the House whether the Government intend to reduce stamp duty if the housing market, or the property market in general, shows a marked downturn, suggesting that it is need of such a counter-balancing stimulus?

It would also be interesting to know whether the Government's longer-term intentions are to use stamp duty as a means of applying a hand on the tiller of the housing market. We hear that the Government are determined to ensure convergence with the economies of our European partners, as a prerequisite to joining economic and monetary union. We have not so far seen very much in the way of convergence on interest rates. Indeed, the trend under this Government has been entirely in the opposite direction.

The Government have lost direct control of interest rates and have an avowed policy of seeking convergence with the economies of our European partners, although they know full well that the structure of the UK housing market is very different from that prevailing in all other European economies. Short-term interest rates have a much greater impact on individuals—that is to say, not to put it too cynically, on voters—in the UK than they do in any other country in the European Union. Do the Government intend to use stamp duty as a method of regulating the housing market, in the absence of any other controls being available to them within economic and monetary union, if and when the UK joined? In that case, what sort of rates of stamp duty might the British public expect to be imposed?

Mr. Love: The hon. Gentleman referred to convergence in Europe. I attended a conference yesterday organised by the Council of Mortgage Lenders, at which a speaker made European comparisons. First, unlike what Opposition Members are saying, the UK is not at the top—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. When hon. Members enter the Chamber, they must be aware of what is occurring. At the moment, the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) is making an intervention.

Mr. Love: I am Mr. Andrew Love, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, like my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire, I have a moustache, so I accept that mistakes can be made.

As I was saying, the first comparison revealed that, unlike what Opposition Members are saying, the UK is not at the top of the owner-occupier league in Europe, although it is close to the top. The more interesting comparison revealed that countries that have a higher rate of owner-occupation are the least wealthy countries in the European Community. Is that the kind of convergence that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) wants?

Mr. Hammond: It is not simply the percentage of owner-occupation that is important, but the way in which it is financed. I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that the United Kingdom has the greatest vulnerability to short-term interest rates as an influence on the housing market.

The Paymaster General knows of my concern with this issue; we have discussed it before. I end by asking him whether, as part of the single currency package that the Government are putting together, the people of Britain are to look forward to stamp duty approaching or reaching continental rates, and being used regularly by the Government, in a downward or upward direction, to regulate fluctuations in the housing market, thereby controlling that important element of demand in the economy.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: This measure is expected to yield £390 million in 1998-99, £470 million in 1999-2000 and more than £520 million in 2001. This is no longer a minor tax: it is a severe tax.

I declare an interest, as one of only two chartered surveyors in the House.

Pension funds have been raided by the withdrawal of advance corporation tax, and now they are being raided still further, because their property assets will have to be devalued in the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors' red book valuation. Until one has proper market comparatives, properties will have to be devalued. Property is always compared with equities, which retain a stamp duty rate of 0.5 per cent; property now faces a savage 100 per cent. increase in respect of values of more than £500,000—hence it will become an unattractive investment class.

It has been estimated by the well-known property consultants BTZ that there was £417 million-worth of overseas property investment in the UK in 1997, double that of 1996. The concern in the property industry is that if these swingeing increases in stamp duty continue, they will reduce the attractiveness of the UK property industry as an inward tax haven of the kind that was so successful in the golden years of Conservative economic management.

My hon. Friends have already commented on the unprogressive nature of stamp duty—it is a lumpy tax. In future Budgets, the Government might like to consider making the tax more evenly progressive. A property currently sold for £499,000 would attract stamp duty, at 2 per cent., of £9,980; whereas a similar property negotiated for sale at £1,000 more, or £500,000, attracts the 3 per cent. rate—a staggering £15,000. That amounts to a marginal rate of tax of around 5,000 per cent.

It would be interesting to know the Government's intentions for this tax. It is all very well increasing taxes in a bull market, but the property market is beginning to stagnate—house prices in London and commercial property prices throughout the UK are slowing down. On behalf of the property industry, I urge the Paymaster General to shed light on the Government's thinking.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: I must begin by explaining to the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) that the Government measure debated in Committee referred to double taxation on the same transaction only—a different set of considerations altogether.

I can tell the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) that I am perfectly happy to consider slicing instead of slabbing—one can see the attractions of that, although the current system is well established. I should add that the change could be effective—given sound reasons for making it—only if the overall tax take did not diminish. Even with a more progressive system, there will be bunching and other anomalies. That is why we cannot accept the new clause's attempt in that direction.

The cost of the proposals contained in amendments Nos. 70 and 71 would be £250 million in a full year—perhaps rather more than Conservative Members intended, although the amendments may be purely illustrative. At the £60,000 and above threshold, the amendments would cost about £700 million. These are orders of magnitude that we could not contemplate.

If Opposition Members would prefer a progressive, slicing system, I should be prepared to consider it; but I certainly cannot deal with that at this stage of a Finance Bill's progress.

The new clause aims to provide relief from stamp duty for land dealers and developers. If they have paid duty of 2 or 3 per cent. on a purchase of land, they would get the duty repaid if they sold the land without improvement within six months, or developed and sold it within two years. The new clause gives no relief where the dealer or developer has paid duty at the 1 per cent. rate.

The proposed relief would have a revenue cost; other things being equal, the rates of duty proposed in the Budget would have to be increased to make up the lost yield. More specifically, that would involve making some arbitrary distinctions between cases qualifying for relief and cases that would not. The same sort of bunching problem would recur.

For example, a dealer selling unimproved land after five months would qualify, but one selling after seven months would not. If the land passed through the hands of a number of dealers in succession, the clause would appear to allow each in turn to claim repayment of duty on his purchase when the land was sold on to the next dealer. A whole series of transactions could result in only one stamp duty charge ultimately being payable.

Similarly, the proposed relief for developers would have arbitrary limits. A development that took longer than two years to complete would not qualify; that would impose arbitrary constraints and distort commercial decisions—not in the best tradition of Tory free-market thinking: more like old Labour. It is much better to impose general rates of duty that apply across the board.

Mr. Hammond: Can the Minister see any really good reason, apart from revenue raising, why a piece of land that changes hands three or four times in a year should be subject to stamp duty at 3 per cent. on each transaction?

Mr. Robinson: There must be a very good reason for the land to pass through three pairs of hands in six months; a profit must be made on it in each case, and, if that is the case, the tax should be levied. That is how markets work. In case the hon. Gentleman does not understand, that is what market economics is: each transaction is taxed, even if there are three or six transactions in a given period. It is much better to let a market work in that way. I accept that we may have differences about the level of tax, but it is not sensible arbitrarily to interfere with markets.

Regrettably, I cannot accept new clause 9, amendments Nos. 70 and 71 or, for that matter, amendments Nos. 45 and 46. The latter two amendments would alter the application of the new top rate of 3 per cent. for stamp duty on transfers of land and buildings. There would be no change for residential property, but, for commercial property, the 3 per cent. would apply only to transfers over £5 million instead of £500,000. The implication is clear that the Opposition believe that the 3 per cent. rate is damaging the commercial property market, but no hon. Member made a convincing case for that in the debate.

I say to the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond)—the subject was also raised in earlier debates—that there is no hidden European agenda to bring our stamp duty rates up to the European level. The equivalent taxes in other European countries are a great deal higher—I gave the figures in the previous debate. Some of them are extraordinarily high. In Belgium, there is a 12.5 per cent. registration tax; in France, registration duty is 8.6 per cent; in Germany, the rate is 3.5 per cent. of purchase price across the board, as far as I can see—no graduation there. In Greece, the rates are 9.3 and 11.3 per cent. In Italy, the rate is 8 per cent; in Luxembourg, 5 per cent. of sales price; in the Netherlands, 6 per cent. of market value of property.

Traditionally, those countries have very high levels of such taxes—higher than ours, and their markets are differently structured. We have no agenda to move to those levels, but—I again address my remarks to the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge—I would not prejudge the Budget judgment that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might wish to reach in any year about the level of stamp duty, given the condition of the property market and the overall state of the economy, and the hon. Gentleman could not realistically expect me to do so.

One thing that we do want to prejudge and avoid, however, is boom-bust in the property market. We had the saddest, most disheartening boom and bust, when young people—especially young couples—were caught in awful negative equity traps as a result of such mismanagement. We certainly want to get away from that. That is why all that we do is geared toward stability, and the taxes that we are debating are part of that.

Amendments Nos. 45 and 46 would cost us £130 million, and, for that reason alone, we cannot accept them. I am sorry that it is no on all counts. I hope that there is no need to press the amendments to a Division, but that decision rests with the Opposition.

Mr. Whittingdale: We should be grateful for small mercies. The Paymaster General has conceded that the present system of the slab operation of stamp duty has the absurd effect of giving rise to incredibly high marginal rates, and he has suggested that he might be prepared to consider that. I hope that we may return to that subject when we debate future Finance Bills; we look forward to debating it then.

The Paymaster General has given us several reasons why he considers our amendments to be deficient, and I understand those reasons. The amendments did not constitute our ideal solution. We should have preferred it if the increases had not been introduced. Our preferred option was that the Paymaster General would tell us that he would not be proceeding with them, but obviously he is not prepared to do so.

The Paymaster General has not entirely reassured us about his future intentions. He has told that us that there is no European agenda to move toward the harmonisation of stamp duty rates, and I suppose that we should be grateful for that, but he has obviously not told us that there will be no intention in future to make further increases in stamp duty. My hon. Friends and I retain a considerable suspicion that the Chancellor now views that as an easy way to increase taxes and raise money.

[Mr. Whittingdale]

We have sought to show that, although the Chancellor may try to suggest that the measure hits the rich and affluent—the owners of large houses—exactly the reverse is the case. It will have an impact throughout the housing market, and many of those young first-time buyers, whom the Paymaster General mentioned, may end up paying more as an indirect result of the measure.

However, as I have suggested, I do not believe that this is the occasion on which to press new clause 8 to a Division, so I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 9

AMOUNT OF INHERITANCE TAX CHARGED IN HERITAGE CHATTELS WHICH DO NOT MEET THE AMENDED HIGHER THRESHOLD TEST

Notwithstanding the provisions in section 140 of and Schedule 25 to this Act (amending section 31 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 introducing a new higher threshold for chattels qualifying for heritage exemption), for those chattels which do not qualify as pre-eminent, the rate of tax will be based on the value at the date when the original heritage exemption was agreed between the owner and the Inland Revenue.—[Mr. Woodward.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 10—Lower corporation tax for art sales—

'.—(1) This section applies to any company whose business consists primarily of the sale of objects, properties and assets (hereinafter referred to as a "qualifying sale of art") which (i) come within group 11 of Schedule 9 to the Value Added Tax Act 1984 and (ii) are effected by or through such company acting as a recognised agent (as defined in sub–paragraph (4) below) where such recognised agent is liable to account for any amount of corporation tax in respect of a quarterly period (hereinafter referred to as a "qualifying tax payment").

(2) The recognised agent shall be deemed to have paid the full amount of his qualifying tax payment in respect of any quarterly period even though he deducted from that full amount a sum equivalent to 40 per cent. of the amount due (the "permitted deduction").

(3) The amount of the permitted deduction shall be calculated for each quarterly payment period, and a permitted deduction may not be carried back or forward for offset in any other quarterly payment period.

(4) For the purposes of this section, a recognised agent means any auctioneer or any person carrying on a trade of dealing in any description of moveable property, or of acting as an agent or intermediary in dealings in any description of moveable property. In respect of any qualifying sale of art there shall be not more than one recognised agent for the purposes of this section within any period of six months who in the event of dispute shall be determined by the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue.

New clause 11—Corporation tax relief for art sales—

'.—(1) This section applies to any sale of objects, properties and assets (hereinafter referred to as a "qualifying sale of art") which (i) is within Group 11 of Schedule 9 to the Value Added Tax Act 1984 and (ii) is effected by or through a recognised agent (as defined in sub–paragraph (4) below) where such recognised agent is liable to account for any amount of Corporation Tax in respect of the quarterly period during which the sale takes place (hereinafter referred to as a "qualifying tax payment").

(2) The recognised agent shall be deemed to have paid the full amount of his qualifying tax payment in respect of any quarterly period even though he deducted from that full amount a sum equivalent to $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. of the proceeds of the sale (the "permitted deduction") in respect of qualifying sales of art occurring in that period.

(3) The amount of the permitted deduction shall be calculated for each quarterly payment period, and the amount of the permitted deduction shall not exceed the amount of the qualifying tax payment for the quarterly payment period to which it relates. A permitted deduction may not be carried back or forward for offset in any other quarterly payment period.

(4) For the purposes of this section, a recognised agent means any auctioneer or any person carrying on a trade of dealing in any description of moveable property, or of acting as an agent or intermediary in dealings in any description of moveable property. In respect of any qualifying sale of art there shall be not more than one recognised agent for the purposes of this section within any period of six months who in the event of dispute shall be determined by the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue.

Amendment No. 72, in clause 39, page 23, line 1, at beginning insert—

'(1) Save as provided in subsection (2),'.

Amendment No. 73, in page 23, line 6, at end insert—

'(2) Sections 26 and 27 of the Taxes Act 1988 shall continue to have effect in respect of the estate and maintenance funds which cover heritage properties receiving an audited number of visitors of 5,000 or more per year.'.

Mr. Woodward: New clause 9 and amendments Nos. 72 and 73, which stand in my name, are obviously about heritage, tourism, access, fairness and a fair tax regime. The Bill is unfair and will damage our tourism and heritage business very much.

Sir Richard Eyre's report for the Government, published today, states:

"Every Government since the War has been committed in principle to the belief that the arts are important . . . and each Government is at some time obliged to ask itself how important".

It is sad that, in the Bill, the Government pay no regard to the importance of our tourism industry or our heritage. At a time when we face the outcome of the comprehensive review of expenditure, Sir Richard Eyre says:

"Whatever the structural outcome, there must be a more positive and constructive approach to delivering arts policy objectives."

The amendments attempt to make sense of a strategy for the arts and tourism that at best is muddled, and at worst—and more likely—is symbolic of the fact that the Department for Culture, Media and Sport is irrelevant in the eyes of the Government, and the Secretary of State has no weight in determining Government policy. The Treasury has won on every count. The purpose of the new clauses and amendments is to ask the Government at this late stage to recognise the considerable damage that will be caused to the arts and the tourism industry.

Amendments Nos. 72 and 73 seek recognition of the importance of heritage properties that attract an audited figure of 5,000 visitors a year. Despite the fact that millions of people enjoy access to those properties, clause 39 would almost certainly deprive many of those people of access to some of the buildings of greatest historical and architectural importance in our country.

This is not the place to rehearse the Government's thinking behind the clause, but I shall give the House an idea of the damage that will be done. The Historic Houses Association calculated that its 64 members who will be affected by the proposal face routine recurring repairs set off against income over the past five years of about £11.4 million. They will have major repairs set against income over the past five years of £6 million. The estimated additional tax that will be payable over the next five years, after the concession is withdrawn, is £8.7 million.

The Treasury is chasing a relatively small sum, but the damage that it will do to public access and to the tourism industry which feeds off access to those houses is considerable. The Historic Houses Association estimates that, every year, 2.7 million people visit the properties that will be affected, and an even greater number enjoy their parks and gardens. Those 2.7 million people will be disappointed so that the Treasury can meanly chase £1.7 million in taxation.

If one of those houses were handed over to the National Trust for it to look after, the cost to the public sector would be around £10 million a year. The problem with clause 39 is that it is certain that some of the 64 houses open to the public will be withdrawn from public access, because the owners will no longer be able to run the properties. The homes will go into the hands of people who may have a great deal of money and who can afford to run the houses without opening them to the public and without taking advantage of one estate election.

Although in their rhetoric the Government are committed to access, in practice they are removing it. The tourism industry, which is on the back of that business, will be brutally damaged. It is sad that, in the clause, the Government are showing that they do not care about the tourism industry. That is clearly summed up in the Culture, Media and Sport Select Committee report, which pointed out that the Secretary of State does not value tourism. The report recommended that tourism should be the lead responsibility of a Minister in the Department, yet there is no sign from the Government that they recognise the importance of that. The report goes on to say:

"We note the Department's commitment to enhance its influence within Whitehall and to highlight the economic and cultural importance of the sectors which it sponsors. However, a commitment is not an achievement and unfortunately the Department has not enhanced its influence in the way it says it would like to do."

That is the point: the Secretary of State has totally failed the heritage and tourism industries. The purpose of amendments Nos. 72 and 73 is to try, at this late stage, to put right the considerable damage that is being done.

Last night, in a token effort to acknowledge the arts industry, the Prime Minister held a seminar at No. 10 Downing street in which many of the new Labour peers and others were invited to take part. The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport told us today about the significance of the "arts summit", as it has been called. He told the Evening Standard that culture would be "written into the core script".

I am sorry, but, unless the hon. Lady shows willing and accepts the amendments and new clauses, it will expose the Prime Minister's meeting last night as mere rhetoric.

Referring to the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State told the Evening Standard:

"I think he really does care. The idea that he is uninterested in the arts is very wide of the mark."

The proof of that statement lies in the Bill's clauses and in whether the hon. Lady will accept the amendments. The magazine Country Life recently said:

"Hidden in the Finance Bill, a Disaster for Heritage."

[Interruption.] I am sorry that Government Back Benchers are unable to acknowledge with any sense of decorum a magazine such as Country Life. That shows rather ably and fitly what callous contempt they have for rural life, for country life, for heritage and for tourism. It demonstrates also how ineffective the Secretary of State has been in making a case on behalf of the arts.

The Government intend to treat the private owner in a callous manner that runs completely counter to what the Secretary of State said last year when he addressed a meeting of the Historic Houses Association and praised the role of the individual owner. The Government will resort to type by taxing those private owners whom, in their rhetoric, they value, but, in their practice, they wish to tax. The consequences will be a forced sale of houses and unemployment for the several thousand people who are directly engaged in running those houses and for the many tens of thousands of people who are in associated tourism sectors such as hotels, shops and cafes.

It is conspicuous that Labour Members did not speak up once in Committee on behalf of their constituents and others who work in sectors related to historic houses. Not once have Labour Members spoken on behalf of the tourism industry that is related to those houses. Labour Members have failed totally to stand up and protect the interests of their constituents. It is significant also that, despite these amendments, not one member of the Heritage team is present in the Chamber. If they had been told about it, those Ministers might have liked to attend. However, I am sure that they were not told, because the Treasury team simply does not care about tourism or culture in our country.

There is no coherent policy: the left hand is taking taxes while the right hand pretends that it cares. One solution in such cases is to conduct a review. However, I am afraid that the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport will be rather disappointed by his latest review, the Eyre report. He will find that he will have to go to the Chancellor to ask for an extra £15 million subsidy for the Royal Opera house. From where will the money come? If that money is found, it will probably come from our heritage of historic houses and from arts sales. The Treasury is in charge of the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. The Treasury is vandalising our heritage, pilfering here and pilfering there; it is squandering a thousand years of history. Access will be lost.

The plundering extends not just to our houses. The purpose of new clause 9, which would result in an important change to the Bill, is to put right a bad and mean-spirited clause which will have far-reaching effects—far-reaching because 20,000 objects on the Victoria and Albert list, otherwise known as the register of conditionally exempt objects, will be affected by the clause.

9.15 pm

Every major auction house in Britain reckons that the consequence of the clause will be a dramatic number of sales of some of the most important architectural, historic, prized national assets, simply because the Treasury lighted on a report from the National Audit Office in 1993 which said that £1 billion had been lost in revenue during the previous 10 years because of the effects of the then current legislation. Labour in opposition regarded the area as a loophole for the rich, and it has moved in to grab the money.

Sadly, it is the public and those who work in the related industries who will suffer. It is a great shame that a Government who wish to kick into touch, by a review, everything that is a problem do not wish to take notice of those who have themselves conducted a review of the clause and those who are behind the thinking of the new clause—bodies such as the Museums and Galleries Commission, the National Trust and the Historic Houses Association, all of which feel that the new rules will severely damage Britain's arts, culture and heritage.

The Government are changing the rules. They are changing the rules so that, for example, the 70-year-old pensioner who has, until now, enjoyed the benefits of conditional exemption, will suddenly be told that she must open up her flat, or wherever else she may live, and give public access—that appointments will not do. It is ludicrous to expect a 70-year-old to open up what might be a small two-bedroomed flat to anyone who wishes to come by. Doubtless, if she did, the Home Secretary would be here in a few weeks telling us what a scandal it was. But the Treasury does not speak to any other Department. The Treasury here is on a smash-and-grab raid to hurt people and to rob them of their heritage, and to rob Britain of its heritage by this mean-spirited clause.

The purpose of new clause 9 is to recognise the damage, strain and stress that the retrospective nature of the breach of rules will cause. We are suggesting that the valuation should not be a current valuation but that, if the rules are to be changed underneath people's feet, the valuation should be based on the value of the item when it was inherited. During the past few years, the value of art objects has increased enormously. It is interesting that, again, the Treasury spots an opportunity, goes in, takes the highest value possible and extracts as much taxation on the back of that as possible.

It is interesting that auction houses such as Sotheby's and Christie's, which might benefit from the sales that will undoubtedly follow as a result of the legislation, say that we should not do this, that it is unfair. They say that their business is not only the sale of works of art but their management. A great deal of their time is devoted to caring for and preserving collections.

Unless the Government accept the new clause, the Bill will ruthlessly damage Britain's art and historic heritage. It is not by chance that the Museums and Galleries Commission made a last-minute plea to the Government to recognise the importance of flexibility. I am sorry that, unlike on amendments Nos. 72 and 73, it has not been possible to meet Ministers on the new clause.

I pay tribute to the Paymaster General because at least he—despite, I think, pressure from some of his colleagues not to have a meeting with regard to one estate election—was prepared to meet the Historic Houses Association and listen to its arguments, and I believe that he was persuaded that there was a real problem. Contrary to what we have heard from the Financial Secretary, I think that he believes that there is a real prospect that damage will be done. I have to give him credit for listening, at the last minute.

Although the Financial Secretary will, sadly, not tell us that there will be significant changes to the Bill, she will have to acknowledge that, as a consequence of the debates in Committee and on the Floor of the House, the Inland Revenue should be asked to consider sympathetically the plight of the most affected houses. This is a sad day for the tourism business and for our country's heritage industry. I can only hope that, instead of showing brazen cheek and being unprepared to consider strong arguments from heritage bodies, she will have the grace at least to recognise the damage that the Bill will do if it is not amended.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I shall speak briefly and, although I applaud what he said, in a slightly more conciliatory spirit than my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Woodward). I declare two interests: first, I am chairman of the all-party arts and heritage group, which is the largest all-party group, and, secondly, I am a member of the Royal Commission on historical manuscripts.

When we last had a Labour Government, there was a proposal for a wealth tax. A number of hon. Members, from both sides of the House, were worried about the impact that that might have on heritage, so we formed the all-party arts and heritage group. We met Ministers, and the most helpful was the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), who was then a Treasury Minister and is now the deputy chairman of the all-party group. He has been one of its most steadfast supporters, and has spoken to the Financial Secretary about these matters. Although he is not in the Chamber, I know that I speak for both of us when I say that I hope that the Government will respond positively, as did the previous Labour Government.

I also hope that the Government will realise that the Bill will do great damage to heritage properties if it is enacted unamended. With great force in a robust speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Witney suggested some of that damage, but I know from 28 years' experience in the House that hon. Members on both sides of the House share my love of and concern for our enduring heritage. I hope that the Financial Secretary's response will prove that she is of our number.

Enough of that—I want to say a few words about objects. My hon. Friend the Member for Witney discussed objects being seen without an appointment being necessary, which is the most important aspect of the changes. If heritage objects, which are often in small and vulnerable properties, could be seen without appointment by people who turned up and demanded to see them, and if they were listed in such a way that anyone would know where they were, a thieves charter would be created.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Dawn Primarolo): The hon. Gentleman is making an important point. I want to be sure, therefore, that he understands what the Government are trying to do. We are not saying that appointments to view objects should be abolished; we are saying that there should be a review of a system where there is appointment-only access to a certain category of object, even though some objects in that category should not be viewed by appointment only. There will still be cases, however, where an appointment will be necessary for the very reasons that the hon. Gentleman has outlined: security, sensitivity and an object's fragility. That was made clear in Committee.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I am glad that the hon. Lady has sought to emphasise that on the Floor of the House.

The Historic Houses Association, which has been cited in evidence and with which I have had many conversations, as I know the hon. Lady has, is anxious to work with the Government as it worked with the previous Government. It knows that there are grounds for changing the current rules, but it is extremely concerned about the "by appointment" aspect. The Royal Commission on historical manuscripts is primarily concerned with historical manuscripts, which are among the most fragile of all objects, and I know that the commission and the Museums and Galleries Commission share the same concerns.

Although I am grateful for the assurance given at the Dispatch Box, which will, to a degree, reassure many people, the hon. Lady must recognise that the Bill is not entirely in line with what she said. I therefore ask her to look at the matter carefully. Next week, the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne and I will see the Minister for Arts and we shall discuss some of the heritage implications. The matter is crucial because, whatever else the Government do, they must not damage an all-party accord that has served our heritage well over the past quarter of a century or more.

My final plea to the hon. Lady is that she build on what has been achieved over the past quarter of a century, and does not damage or jeopardise it.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I wish to speak to new clauses Nos. 10 and 11. We have heard how the Government's deafness to my hon. Friends' pleas may lead to the sale of a great deal of art. I wish to outline proposals to deal with the problem for the London art market. The sales may be a last hurrah, unless we deal with a fundamental threat facing that market today.

More than 20,000 people are directly employed in the art market in this country, and its turnover is about £2 billion a year. Half that trade comprises works of art that enter the country and then leave it. More than £1 billion of art is imported and nearly £1 billion is exported. By far the largest sources for those imports are Switzerland and the United States, and those countries are also by far the largest markets for exports. Unless the problems that I am about to describe are addressed, at least half the art market, in London in particular—a world art market and undoubtedly the leading art market in Europe—will go not just outside this country but outside the European Union, back to Switzerland and the United States.

Christie's, one of the world's leading auction houses, recently acquired the Rockefeller Centre in New York. It is preparing for the fact that the London art market, where it has been since its foundation, may be about to leave its historic shores. The problem that faces Christie's is that of VAT harmonisation, and the purpose of the new clauses—I would welcome any suggestion that the Financial Secretary has to improve them—is to mitigate the effect of that threat on art houses and the art market in the UK.

Until five years ago, there was no VAT on imports of works of art. The change was introduced by the previous Government, after a great deal of pressure from our EU partners. A concessionary rate of 2.5 per cent. on the cost of those imports was agreed, but after five years it was agreed that that rate of VAT would rise to 5 per cent. In Switzerland and the United States, there is no import duty on such works of art.

9.30 pm

We have evidence that, as a result of the imposition of a 2.5 per cent. rate of VAT, the amount of art coming into this country has reduced, and there is every indication from the art world that, if the duty goes up to 5 per cent., the market in the UK will be destroyed.

I am grateful to the British Art Market Federation, of which my right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) is president, for the information that it has supplied on this serious issue. If the Government take no action, 10,000 jobs are at risk. In its report, the BAMF says:

"Markets take years to develop but can be lost very quickly."

It is in no doubt that, if action is not taken, the Government will share responsibility for that.

It is highly fitting that we are debating this issue on 30 June, at the end of the UK presidency of the European Union. How much time did the Minister or any of her colleagues spend during the past six months addressing the problem of the real threat to the 10,000 jobs directly affected?

Mr. Love: The trend in the international art market in recent years has resulted in a major shift of focus from Europe to the United States. A number of the major companies that the hon. Gentleman mentioned are now under American ownership. How can he persuade us that it is that trend at work, and not a spurious problem in Europe?

Mr. St. Aubyn: The hon. Gentleman gives me an opportunity to declare an interest. It so happens that my brother-in-law is chairman of the fifth largest auction house in this country, Brooks auctioneers, which specialises in classic cars. It was the first London auction house to be started for 200 years, and it has established itself as a world leader in the field of classic cars. That company would undoubtedly like to retain London at the heart of its business, but it is being forced to open up in Switzerland and in the United States precisely because of the threat that affects not only classic works of art, but classic cars.

I am grateful to my brother-in-law for pointing out the example of Australia, which introduced a system of duty on imports that led to the complete collapse of its market. He tells me that non-EU buyers account for about 30 per cent. of sales in classic cars. That trade will move out of this country if the Government do not confront and deal with the issue of harmonisation.

What would be the effect of our new clause? We cannot change VAT rates in a Finance Bill debate. Without the will of the Government, we cannot change what has been agreed by other member states, although when the harmonisation deal was struck five years ago, it was agreed that the European Union would undertake an investigation into the effects of harmonisation. We are now six months from the end of 1998, by which time, at the very latest, that study should have been carried out, and there is still no evidence that the EU is putting its mind to this issue. How much time and effort did the Minister and her colleagues give during our presidency to getting this study under way, so that the matter can be addressed by the EU?

We have had to react to the current situation. The Government's total inaction has put 10,000 jobs at risk. We must come up with a local solution to the problem. The local solution is to provide a form of tax rebate on corporation tax. No doubt the Minister will tell us that that would cost a great deal of money: in a full year, it may cost more than £10 million. I draw her attention to the study by the eminent economist Peter Oppenheimer, "VAT in the UK Art Trade", which pointed out the tremendous fiscal advantages to the UK Exchequer of increasing the market through the encouragement of imports. Since he undertook that study 11 years ago, we have seen the London market develop, strengthen and grow.

We are not talking about a case in which it may cost the Government £10 million in lost revenue to mitigate the effects on imports; we are talking about the loss of the entire market, the loss of all the VAT receipts and the loss of all the corporation tax. Furthermore, there are the indirect losses—the losses to London's tourist trade, its hotels and its major shops. When people visit an art market auction in London, they do so to enjoy themselves. They spend money, and fructify London's economy at the same time. If the Minister and her colleagues fail to accept and meet the challenge, they will not only damage the art market, but fail London—and far more than 10,000 jobs will be lost.

I do not pretend that the new clauses and amendments are perfect. As I have said, they constitute an attempt to raise an issue and ask Ministers key questions, and it is in that spirit that I seek answers.

Mr. Swayne: I shall be brief, but I wish to speak in favour of amendments Nos. 72 and 73. In doing so, I shall quote from a letter from my constituent Sir Edward Hulse, who farms at Breamore house near Fordingbridge and who opens the house to the public.

In the interests of brevity, I shall not read out the entire letter, but it begins with the heading "One Estate Election", and continues:

"The removal of this concession is particularly dangerous for the small house, (houses who have less than 50,000 visitors a year). In 1954 we had c. 40,000 visitors but now have c. 14,000. The competition has increased out of all proportion to the number of people requiring leisure . . .

I estimate maintenance at £15,000 pa. There are of course times when this is exceeded. If One Estate Election is withdrawn maintenance would have to be reduced as less cash would be available. In my case at least £2,500 pa."

I think that the House will agree that that is a staggering reduction in the amount of maintenance.

Sir Edward's letter continues:

"but if farm profits rose these would be partially used to catch up with the backlog of maintenance."

It is, I think, a pious hope that farm profits would increase in this climate. That alone should be an argument for the Government to show some sympathy.

The letter goes on:

"I do find maintenance a major problem but it must be in the national interest"— in the national interest, that is, for Sir Edward to receive help. He writes:

"I admit this concession is helpful."

He continues:

"There is a lot of talk about public access and we open on average five days a week (three in April and everyday in August). The point is this costs money particularly in April. Consideration would have to be given to reducing the season if we are to have less money available for maintenance. My first priority must be to the House".

Sir Edward's second priority, he writes, must be his visitors.

In this age of fascination with the millennium, the 21st century and the age of "cool", we are perhaps less mindful of our heritage; but I am sure that we all agree on the importance of our link with the past. The most vital element in the maintenance of that link is the private owner. Indeed, the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport said only recently:

"The private owner remains the most effective economic guardian of this sector."

I believe that the private owner is undermined by clause 39, and that amendments Nos. 72 and 73 go some way towards remedying the situation.

The simple fact is that, if we treat listed buildings and country houses as ordinary businesses, they will become uneconomic. The ability to set maintenance costs against income is vital. It is nonsense to pretend that the money for maintenance could be found out of tax income.

As Sir Edward Hulse points out, opening the house to the public only barely covers the costs. What will be the consequences of the clause if it is unamended? Repairs will be put off, public access will be curtailed and restricted, contents will be sold, collections will be broken up and valuable works of art will be lost to the nation. Eventually, houses will be sold and the doors will be closed to the public. Far from removing one estate election, the Government need to extend it to all existing owners. That would be the proper way in which to end this anomaly.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): The Whips kindly released me for this evening. I have returned from the engagement that I had with my constituents elsewhere because of the importance of the issues that my hon. Friends the Members for Witney (Mr. Woodward) and for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) have relevantly and admirably raised in the debate.

I declare an interest, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford has referred. I am president of the British Antique Dealers Association. As I record in the Register of Members' Interests, I receive an uncovenanted case of wine at Christmas, which is not in any sense part of any contract that I have with it. As my hon. Friend also said, I am president of the British Art Market Federation, which was created in the last year of the previous Government because they said that it would be much easier if they could deal with the art market as a whole, and not deal with 15 or 16 different parts. My hon. Friend the Member for South–West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page) was the Minister who engaged in that dialogue, and I am delighted to see him in the Chamber.

To deal with the matters relating to the British Art Market Federation, my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford has dealt with the state of the market cogently. I shall not rehearse those issues again, even though it is only early in the night, except to congratulate him warmly on the comprehensiveness with which he has set out the problems, of which I am certain the two Treasury Ministers who are present are vividly aware.

I acknowledge that the problems are created for us from elsewhere in the European Union—they are not totally under the control of this Government—but it is extremely important that Treasury Ministers fight strenuously and robustly on our behalf, otherwise the sad consequences to which my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford referred, are likely to come to pass.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Witney has said, the Government have got themselves into some difficulty with the arts in general, which the Prime Minister, who has been substantially responsible for that development, is seeking to repair. It has already, I fear, been commonplace in relevant circles that the Government do not care much for the heritage. I find that a disappointment, given my recollection—I was in the House at the time of the previous Government; indeed I have served on a Committee that considered the Finance Bill in the time of that Government.

I am sorry about the Government's policy, as it contradicts the tradition that had been observed by previous Labour Governments. The Treasury, particularly during the passage of Finance Bills, worked constructively with the heritage lobby in terms of its preservation. I am genuinely surprised that it should be through the Finance Bill that the Government should have launched the assault on the heritage, and there is no question but that there is an element of assault about it, although the Financial Secretary may be able to reassure us at a later date.

There was a major move of British works of art out of this country at the time of the Reformation because of what happened to the churches during that era. Happily, as the almighty is even-handed, in the earliest part of the 19th century, with the reign of Pugin and neo-Gothicism, much art came back into this country's churches, but the changes to taxes in the 1880s, particularly in relation to aspects of entail and inheritance tax, were responsible for major sales by British families in historic houses, and many works of art crossed the Atlantic during that period, which we can now admire in American museums. It is sad that the collections that were sold were not replenished with contemporary art in the late 19th century, or, indeed, in the 20th century. The collections of British historic houses are nothing like as impressive in terms of the art of the last 100 years as they are in terms of art from the five previous centuries.

9.45 pm

I am not laying the blame for that at the Government's door, but they are threatening us with the deluge onto the art market to which my hon. Friend the Member for Witney referred. Like my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack), he alluded to the potential threat of burglary. There have been relatively recent convictions of organised gangs which simply used "Who's Who?" as a way to identify houses around the country where there might be rich pickings. Some exceptionally disagreeable violence was involved in the burglaries. That causes great anxiety to the owners of historic houses who fear that, under the Government's regulations, they may be under similar threat of burglary and violence because their details will be readily available.

Mr. Love rose—

Mr. Brooke: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, not least because that will enable me to respond to something that he said earlier in an intervention.

Mr. Love: I have listened carefully to the right hon. Gentleman's reasonable remarks, as I did to those of the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack), but I have not yet heard any criticism from the Opposition about conditional access agreements, or any recognition that things had to change.

Mr. Brooke: The hon. Gentleman intervened earlier on my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford who was explaining why tax changes in the European Union are threatening to move the art market out of Europe. I shall come back to the hon. Gentleman's most recent intervention in a moment. The hon. Gentleman said previously that a number of powerful houses had passed into American hands, but they did so because American investors could see the virtue and value of those houses. The present chief executive of Sotheby's learned her trade in these activities sitting in the offices in New Bond street, which was to the great good of Anglo-American trade.

Mr. Woodward: I am sure that my right hon. Friend agrees that it is terribly important that the record shows that no one is saying that there should not be some change. All the relevant bodies recognise the great importance of bringing regulations up to date, but the phrase that is consistently used is "a sledgehammer to crack a walnut".

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He has helped me to respond to the latest intervention by the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love).

Over the past five or 10 years, we have of course been aware of comments and, it is fair to say, criticisms about the existing arrangements. It is not for me to speak for the Opposition. Indeed, my name is not even attached to the new clause, and it is for my Front-Bench colleagues to respond. However, I have no difficulty in recognising the need for the intelligent interaction that there has been in the past.

The Financial Secretary said that these matters had been fully discussed in Committee. I must confess that I was disappointed and distressed to find how unavailable Ministers had been to talk to the Historic Houses Association.

Dawn Primarolo rose—

Mr. Brooke: I shall gladly give way to the hon. Lady, but she has to stand by what is on the record from Committee.

Dawn Primarolo: What the right hon. Gentleman says is not true. The Historic Houses Association met representatives from the Treasury, and it is as a result of that meeting that the abolition of the one estate election was delayed for three years. There was a meeting on 24 June, and the HHA said in its newsletter that it has no complaints about access to the Treasury or its Ministers. I shall return to that point when I reply to the debate.

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for saying that, although there seemed to have been some difficulty in Committee for a Minister even to be available, except on a telephone. However, if she assures me on the matter, I shall of course take her words in good faith.

The whole purpose of my speaking in this debate was to say that I hope that the Government will do more than they have so far been able to do, to reassure not only the Historic Houses Association but those who have such properties across the country that the situation will not deteriorate sharply. As my hon. Friend the Member for Witney said, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport—which once upon a time was called the Department of National Heritage—has passed effectively into the hands of the Treasury. If the situation does deteriorate sharply and many notable works of art are put on the market, it will be very unfortunate if that flood reaches the market at precisely the moment that the Treasury has decided that the amount of money available to the national heritage memorial fund is to be reduced.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) has spoken with great authority on the subjects dealt with by the new clauses and amendments. I hope that the Financial Secretary will deal very seriously with the points that have been made.

I should like to support my hon. Friends on conditionally exempt heritage assets, and to endorse particularly the speeches by my hon. Friends the Members for Witney (Mr. Woodward) and for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack). Although they differed in their tone, their message was the same: the current system works very well. Exemption from inheritance tax for those assets keeps them in private hands and relieves the state of a great deal of expenditure. If the assets were taken into public collections, they would have to be looked after, insured and secured at public expense.

The current system therefore saves the Exchequer a good deal of money, while allowing perfectly reasonable public access. I am not aware of any tide of discontent among connoisseurs or those interested in the arts and heritage who feel that the current system denies them the chance of looking at and studying those objects. I hope that the Government will at the very least implement the legislation with great sensitivity.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) on his extreme ingenuity not only in tabling a new clause on the second issue—VAT on art imports—but on the new clause being in order, as VAT is not usually debated during consideration of a Finance Bill. He and other hon. Members have drawn attention to the acute threat that will be faced by the British art market if, as planned, VAT on art imports is doubled next year. The industry employs more than 50,000 people. Although we are not supposing that the industry will disappear—there will always be a domestic market for the exchange of works of art—the international market, on which London, but also very many provincial dealers, depend, will be gravely weakened if the VAT rate on imports is doubled.

Quite simply, art sent to London for sale will be diverted to other centres outside the European Union. Therefore, not only will the United Kingdom suffer, but the European Union as an institution will witness a decline in art sales. Such an action is also particularly stupid when we are trying to encourage repatriation to Europe and to the United Kingdom of works of art that were dispersed during previous waves of art exports, wars and revolutions.

When my noble friend Lord Cope was a Treasury Minister, he secured a review of such a tax threat before it took effect. I should like to ask the Minister what action the Government have taken to express the British Government's point of view to the Commission during the review period. Specifically, what discussions with other member states have been held during the British presidency?

We are supposed to have unparalleled influence in the European Union—that is what the Prime Minister tells us. We should like some evidence of that. What steps has he taken to defend a precious, almost unique national asset—the highly successful international market based in the United Kingdom which is threatened at best by erosion and at worst by a wholesale decampment to other non-EU centres such as Geneva and New York? Perhaps the Financial Secretary will bring us up to date on what the British Government are doing to protect our national interests in relation to the art market.

Dawn Primarolo: This has been an important debate, although some speeches have exaggerated somewhat the Government's attempts to secure public access to certain items of national heritage. Let me start by responding directly to the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) as chairman of the all-party arts and heritage group, and the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) in respect of balancing the need to secure public access to items of value and importance to our heritage with other interests. They acknowledged that the previous regime is not immune to criticism in respect of access by members of the public to particular items.

The Government propose that access by appointment only should be abolished and that access by appointment coupled with a measure of open access should remain. The maintenance and preservation needs of assets will remain key factors in deciding the level and type of access. That was made clear in Committee, and I make it clear again now.

The principle is that, with the conditional exemption, taxpayers' money will be provided to secure reasonable access to the items in question. That is what we are seeking to achieve. We are not talking about forcing anyone to do anything. The outrageous propositions that were made in Committee, and again this evening, about the likely outcome of our proposals are wrong, and amount to scaremongering. We would all wish to send a clear message from the House to that effect.

Mr. Woodward: Will the Minister give way?

Dawn Primarolo: Let me finish responding to the point that the hon. Gentleman raised in his speech.

Some owners will be worried about what open or extended access might mean. Let me emphasise again to the hon. Gentleman before I take his intervention that our primary objective is certainly not to force people out of the exemption scheme or jeopardise security of assets. It is to ensure that the public have proper access to tax-exempt assets. The new arrangements do not affect the basic requirement that access has to be reasonable.

Mr. Woodward: Will the Financial Secretary clarify an issue on that point? Let us consider the case of a 70-year-old lady who lives on her own in her flat and has enjoyed conditional exemption for a particular antique. Currently, individuals may come to see that, object by appointment. Under the changes, viewing by appointment only will not suffice. The onus will now be put on the 70-year-old lady to ensure that the object can be made available to the public. If she is unable to find a library, museum or gallery that will take it, will the current by-appointment arrangements still stand, ensuring that the 70-year-old lady will not be required to open her house to the public?

Dawn Primarolo: I made it clear to the hon. Gentleman in Committee and shall make it clear again that access has to be reasonable. How it is decided will be the subject of the agreement reached between the Inland Revenue and the individual. If there is a dispute, the special commissioners will have the final say on whether access arrangements are reasonable. The hon. Gentleman knows that we have chosen our words to secure a balance between public access to an asset for which we are paying and the continued preservation of the item.

An owner will not be able to say that it is inconvenient for them ever to allow access to the item while requiring the conditional exemption. If taxpayers' money is taken for a conditional exemption, there must be a clear understanding that reasonable access to the item will be provided for the public. The fears about there being a flood of goods on to the market and a mass exodus of items will not materialise. We are not removing or applying any new tests to the assets that currently have the conditional exemption. We are ensuring that the access to which owners committed themselves when they accepted the arrangements for conditional exemption is reasonable and works.

Mr. Brooke: Will the Financial Secretary say a word about how she will monitor what happens? She says that my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) and I are exaggerating the potential. If we turn out to be right, how will she measure what is happening, and what will she do about it?

Dawn Primarolo: I did not include the right hon. Gentleman in my remarks about exaggeration. He and the Member for South Staffordshire made reasonable and measured contributions to this important debate. The Government have allowed a six-month period for negotiations with owners on access to assets. We have acknowledged that there are security issues and that there could be problems with the fragility of items such as manuscripts that would determine what might be considered reasonable access. We have agreed all the issues of access to an asset, but we have made it clear—as, I think, the right hon. Member agrees—that if taxpayers' money is provided for conditional exemption to protect heritage and to give access to members of the public to enjoy that heritage, reasonable access must be available. Frankly, it is not in all cases at present.

There have been Adjournment debates and early-day motions on the matter, and repeated questions have been raised with me as the Minister. To my knowledge, at least two television programmes have been heavily critical of the scheme and have given specific examples where the current reasonable access arrangements are not in operation. As both the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster and the hon. Member for South Staffordshire acknowledged, the scheme needs to be updated and improved.

That is all we are seeking to achieve with the measures. We are being understanding and sensitive to the issues. Therefore, amendments Nos. 72 and 73 are unnecessary. In fact, it is unacceptable that we should give a further tax reduction to those who may now decide that they perhaps never wanted to provide reasonable access, and were never forced to do so. Now, faced with reasonable access, they no longer want the conditional exemption, and they say that they want a tax deduction as well. That is what the amendments would do. That is not acceptable to the Government, and I ask the House to reject the amendments.

I would say in addition to the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster that, in moving to the new reasonable public access arrangements by agreement, there is no requirement for an asset to have a test or to be requalified. Therefore, there is no reason why people should be forced out of the conditional exemption scheme. If they choose to leave it, that is up to them, but they will not get additional tax help from the Government on the basis of the value of that asset, and therefore the taxes liable to be paid on it.

I wish to refer to the one estate election. I have a letter from the Historic Houses Association, dated 26 June 1998, which shows the positive relationship that exists between the HHA and the Government. The letter states:

"I read that further amendments . . . have been tabled by the Opposition, I imagine to be taken at Report stage of the Finance Bill. The Association would wish it to be on the record that these amendments have not been promoted by the HHA."

The letter continues:

"On One Estate Election, whilst the Association's concerns also remain, they have been recorded both in writing to Ministers and at a meeting with the Paymaster General, for which the HHA was grateful."

The HHA met officials after it was announced that we were to abolish the one estate election. As a result of its representations, the abolition was delayed for three years, to 2001.

My hon. Friend the Paymaster General met the association on 24 June. It was clear that, although about 700 farms and various other pieces of estate were covered by the one estate election, there was a question whether 60 or 70 houses could be in some difficulty. It was agreed that the HHA would go away, work on the proposals, discuss them with the Government and come back to the Government to see how we could make progress on the matter. The association entirely accepts that one estate election should be abolished, that the relief is not suitable and that it was never intended to be a heritage relief.

[Dawn Primarolo]

Therefore, we need to continue the discussions with the association. Given that the abolition of one estate election takes place in 2001, we have time to work with the association on that.

I turn now to new clauses 10 and 11 and the possible increase in VAT on the art market from 2.5 per cent. to 5 per cent. I share hon. Members' concerns about the possible impact of that change, particularly on the London art market. All hon. Members will want to ensure that we do all that we can to protect that valuable and important market.

I know that the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) is particularly knowledgeable on this subject because of his personal interest. He has recently written a number of articles about the importance of the art market. He reminded the House that, in 1994, his predecessor as Paymaster General negotiated with the European Union a derogation on the imposition of VAT on the art market. The rate is 2.5 per cent. and is due to rise to 5 per cent. by 1999.

The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the review process. The officials at Customs and Excise have been actively involved in meetings and correspondence with the Commission about the terms and scope of the review that is to take place. The Department has been working closely with representatives of the art market. As I am sure the House expects, the Government are determined to ensure that we properly represent and defend the interests of the London art market. We are actively pursuing this matter. The right hon. Gentleman will know that we have been arguing about the review's terms of reference, and I am sure that he accepts that it is crucial to get those right before we allow the review to commence. That has been the focus of our work, and we shall continue with that work.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) on his new clause, but it will not work. It is drafted very narrowly, and I am sure that he would not want to damage the art market that he says he wants to protect. In tabling the new clause, he has enabled the House to have an important debate and the Government to put on record the value that we continue to place on the art market. In the negotiations on the review, we shall pursue the best interests of the Government, the country and the London art market. If the hon. Gentleman will not withdraw his new clause, I must recommend that the House votes against it and new clause 11.

Mr. Woodward: I am grateful to the Financial Secretary for those comments and the spirit in which they were made. None the less, as the hon. Lady put on record a letter from the Historic Houses Association, it is important that the record also records the sequence of events.

The committee met on Tuesday 19 May. One month later, it wrote to the Chairman of the Culture, Media and Sport Committee, saying;

"Against the background of what we see as a clear case and compelling arguments, we are dismayed that to date the Paymaster General has not agreed to see us, that Chris Smith and his Ministers are not inclined to support our arguments, nor have our letters either been answered or acknowledged."

The hon. Lady stands before the House and says how reasonable her Department and officials have been, and I make no criticism whatever of her officials, but it is important that she does not let other people take the blame for a matter that is effectively her responsibility.

We should give credit to the Paymaster General, who allowed a meeting—albeit only last week. As a result of the meeting, the Inland Revenue has agreed to discuss the problem of open houses over the coming months. It is crucial, however, that the Financial Secretary is not allowed to suggest that all this was always going to happen. That was certainly not the case when HHA representatives telephoned the Paymaster General's office and were told, despite what was said in Committee in May, that the office was too busy and that the matter should be dealt with on the telephone. It is only thanks to the Paymaster General's efforts that the meeting took place at all.

This evening several changes and clarifications of how access to the V and A list will operate have been offered. We are grateful to the Financial Secretary for having listened to our proposals, and for the fact that they are now being implemented. It is significant, though, that the Government are still unable to produce the guidelines necessary for all the heritage bodies concerned. We look forward to seeing them in due course. In the meantime, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New clause 16

TAX CREDIT COMPENSATION FOR CHARITIES WITH INVESTMENTS IN MIXED FUNDS

'.—For section 29 (2)(b) of the Finance (No. 2) Act 1997 there shall be substituted—

"(b) to any part of the qualifying distribution which, were it not for section 469 (2) of the Taxes Act 1988, falls to be regarded as income of section 505 bodies.".'.—[Mr. Fallon.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

10.15 pm

Mr. Fallon: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment No. 53, in clause 47, page 26, line 22, leave out '31st December 2000' and insert '31st March 2001'.

Government amendments Nos. 1 to 3.

Amendment No. 54, in page 27, line 44, leave out '31st December 2000' and insert '31st March 2001'.

Mr. Fallon: I begin, perversely, with the Government amendments, which we welcome. I acknowledge, on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) who raised the point in Committee, how far the Government have gone to extend the definition of what can be supplied in kind as medical equipment. My hon. Friend has another engagement, but he wanted me to convey his thanks to the Minister for meeting us on that point.

As for amendments Nos. 53 and 54, the Economic Secretary will recall our discussion in Committee on these points. Incidentally, I declare an interest, in that I am an unremunerated director of a charity that may benefit from the amendments. The issue here was simple: the date at which this new and welcome extension of charitable relief was to begin was intended to allow for a two-and-three-quarter year period. It was proposed initially to bring it into operation on 1 April this year; its implementation has now been delayed until some time after Royal Assent. As the exemption is designed to end on 31 December 2000, charities have been given less than two and a half years. That also means that the exemption ends, rather uncomfortably, three quarters of the way through the tax year.

I suggested to the Minister in Committee that it might be helpful to let the exemption run on for the final three months—January, February and March of 2001. She kindly agreed to consider the matter, which is why we have tabled these amendments.

The purpose of new clause 16 is to help a different group of charities, such as the Thalidomide Trust, which are still disadvantaged by the withdrawal of tax credit relief for UK equity dividends. The withdrawal was in two stages: for pension funds and the like it was put into effect immediately, on the day of last July's Budget; but foreseeing the impact on charities, the Government allowed a breathing space until April 1999. A compensation scheme with a tapered relief for five years was also introduced.

The problem comes for those charities that invested in mixed funds. The Thalidomide Trust was one of the charities that invested in the Aquila funds. These were unit trusts specially created to facilitate efficient investment pooling for pension funds and their charity clients. That worked well because both types of client were entitled to the same tax exemption.

Before investing in those funds, the Thalidomide Trust checked very carefully with the Inland Revenue. On 16 December 1996, it was told that "the proposed investment in Aquila Funds would be accepted as 'qualifying' for" the exemption. However, as a result of the subsequent July Budget, the pension fund lost relief; charities whose investment was pooled with it lost the relief at the same time—a relief to which they would otherwise have been fully entitled.

You may wonder, Mr. Deputy Speaker, why we raise the matter almost a year after the deed was done. We do so because, on 22 June 1998, the Thalidomide Trust wrote to us, having had little joy from the Government. On 21 January 1998, the charity wrote to the Revenue; it wrote again on 30 March, and then it wrote to the Chancellor. Receiving no satisfaction, it wrote to us.

We took up the matter immediately. I raised it with the Financial Secretary to the Treasury at Question Time last Thursday, 25 June. My hon. Friends will now understand why the Financial Secretary has left the Chamber; they will recall that, when I raised the matter, she advised us not to make "cheap points". To be fair, perhaps she said that on the rebound. It certainly is not a cheap point to the Thalidomide Trust, which stands to lose some £75,000 because of the inadvertent drafting of a clause—or so it was led to believe.

The Thalidomide Trust wrote to the Chancellor earlier this month because, in the final correspondence that the charity had with the chairman of the Board of the Inland Revenue, he made it clear that the compensation scheme to which I referred—the relief scheme—was not wholly drawn up by the Revenue, but had been expressly decided on by Ministers. In Mr. Montagu's letter to the Thalidomide Trust—he is the chairman of the Board of the Inland Revenue—he revealed that Ministers were aware of the position of charities that had invested in mixed funds. Apparently, the legislation had to be narrowly drawn in order to avoid complexity—not something that the Government were successful in avoiding elsewhere in the Finance (No. 2) Act 1997. However, I put that to one side.

The consequences were clear. The Thalidomide Trust—other charities may well be in such a position—has lost about £70,000. That is a serious loss because, in a few years' time, the trust will receive no further capital payments. The House needs no reminding that more than 400 people were disabled by the thalidomide drug. They have continuing and very expensive needs.

The previous Government recognised the special difficulty of charities such as the Thalidomide Trust. When, in 1996, it was apparent that the trust had insufficient capital to maintain the distributions to beneficiaries at existing levels, the previous Conservative Government chipped in some £7 million. Tonight, we are talking about £70,000 being taken from it. That is not a huge sum. I should have thought that it was perfectly possible, with all the technical expertise that is available to the Inland Revenue, for the compensation scheme to be adjusted. I very much hope, therefore, that the Minister will reconsider.

Mr. Gibb: As events unfold since the July Budget last year, more and more injustices are becoming apparent from the decision taken last July to end the repayment of dividend tax credits. We are already aware that, as a result of that one decision, pension funds—the funds that will give rise to the incomes of elderly people in their retirement—have been robbed to the tune of £5 billion a year. That means that, unless people increase their contributions to their pension funds, they will lose substantial sums on retirement.

There is considerable evidence that people are not aware of what the Government did to their pension funds last year, and they will have a nasty shock in 20 years if they have not increased their pension contributions, or their employers have not increased their contributions by about 11 per cent. on average. Those pension funds will be inadequately funded, and people's pensions in retirement will be less than they would otherwise have been, and less than people expected.

We have also heard of the injustice arising from the decision taken last July about non-taxpaying pensioners—300,000 of them—who, on average, will be £75 a year worse off as a result of that measure. Earlier today, we heard from constituents throughout the land who will suffer real hardship next April when the measure comes into force, and people will no longer be able to reclaim £100, £200, £300 or £400 a year from their dividend income.

We know already of the injustice being faced by charities generally as a result of the measure taken last July to end the repayment of dividend tax credits. Charities will lose £400 million a year, despite the taper, because tapers eventually taper to an end. At that time, charities will lose significant income. Some will suffer very badly indeed, especially those that rely on their investment income from endowments established over the years.

As a result of a letter from the Thalidomide Trust, a further injustice has become apparent, which arises for charities that have invested in mixed funds. One wonders how many further injustices will arise from that one measure. We have seen the wholesale restructuring of the corporation tax regime as a result of a measure taken in the Finance Act last year.

The Thalidomide Trust is a worthwhile organisation which helps to deal with the children affected by the thalidomide drug 30 years ago. As a person of 37 years of age, born at the time that the drug was about, but for the grace of God, I could easily have been one of those children. Contemporaries of my mother took the drug, and people of my age are acutely aware of the damage that it did to so many people in this country. As a result of a measure taken in July 1997, the Thalidomide Trust will lose £70,000 a year.

The matter has been handled callously; there seems to be no sensitivity on the Government's part. It seems that they are so determined to fulfil their pledge of winning two election terms that they intend to fulfil their spending pledges by stealthily taxing pension funds and charitable organisations. They do not care about the consequences for non-taxpaying individuals—the 300,000 pensioners. They do not care what effect their measures will have on the real value of pension funds. Judging from correspondence from the Revenue, the Government clearly do not care about the effect on the Thalidomide Trust.

I quote from another letter from the chairman of the Inland Revenue to the Thalidomide Trust. He states:

"I am afraid that there is nothing I can helpfully add. Ministers took their policy decision in full knowledge of the implications and it is for us to give effect to it."

Ministers knew what they were doing; it was not an error or oversight. Their action has caused enormous damage to the Thalidomide Trust, and I hope very much that the Minister will tell the House tonight that she intends to reverse the decision and accept the amendments, or propose another measure that will alleviate the £70,000 loss endured by that important charitable trust.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Helen Liddell): I shall begin with the three Government amendments. I am grateful for the acknowledgement by the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) of the line that the Government took in Committee. We chose to introduce three new amendments this evening in order to make incontrovertibly clear what I said in Committee about extending the scope of the benefit that marks the millennium. In Committee, I explicitly read the Government's view on to the record. However, in order to give those who are so generous as to support charity in this way the added reassurance that medical provision would be included, we thought that it would be wise to introduce the three new amendments. I am grateful for the support of Opposition Members.

In relation to amendments Nos. 53 and 54, we had a lengthy discussion in Committee about the date of the millennium. I must admit that we had some fun in Committee discussing the millennium date definition advanced by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey). He seemed to think that the millennium was a movable feast and that perhaps, like the synod of Whitby, we could convene and discuss a date that would be the millennium. As a consequence, both the Government and the official Opposition reached rare agreement about the date of the millennium.

I said that I would reconsider the case made by the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) for extending the provision for three months beyond the date of the millennium. However, I do not think that the case has been made for that extension. The measure is designed to focus giving for a specific purpose on one specific date: it allows people to mark the millennium by assisting those who are in poverty in less advantaged parts of the world. The scheme must have a cut-off date, and that date coincides logically with the millennium.

I remind the hon. Gentleman, as I did earlier in Committee, about the continuing investigation into the future of charities taxation. Anything we do in relation to this millennium giving does not prejudge in any way what could happen under the review of charities taxation. There is no reason to believe that there will be a less advantageous system for giving after the millennium because of the ending of this millennium project about which the Chancellor feels so strongly. For those reasons, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not press the amendments. That would be unfortunate, given our commonality of purpose in relation to this scheme, which would allow the generous people of this country to mark the millennium in a way that gives the greatest benefit to the poorest in our world.

I turn to proposed new clause 16. The Opposition have introduced an exceptionally narrow point on Report which, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out, is concerned with investments by charities through mixed unauthorised unit trusts. The new clause is not very robust technically, but I will not concentrate on its technical aspects. I turn to the substantive argument to answer the hon. Gentleman's points.

The wider point is that charities have a range of options when investing their money. We made quite sure that the advisers to charities had a year to digest the implications of our proposals last year for tax credits on dividends. What is more, we have given them almost as long again to prepare for next April when the proposals come fully into force. Therefore, charities have the opportunity to put their funds into investments in such a way as to maximise tax benefits while maximising their returns.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the Thalidomide Trust and, surprisingly, introduced some rather unfortunate inaccuracies in relation to that trust. I have in front of me the first letter received by Ministers in relation to that matter dated 22 June 1998, eight days ago—a letter to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That correspondence relates to the contact that there has been between the Thalidomide Trust and the Revenue.

The point at issue about the advice that the Revenue gave to the Thalidomide Trust relates to events in December 1996, when the Thalidomide Trust contacted the Revenue to ensure that its investments were in no way part of a tax avoidance scheme. The Revenue's response was the kind of confirmation that it required. But there is no way in which the Revenue could give any guarantees about future tax treatment, particularly as this happened under the previous Government. There was a general election, and the present Government decided to correct the anomaly that had existed in relation to tax credits.

I have specifically asked Revenue officials whether they have evidence of any other charities that have encountered the same difficulty, and we know of none. The Revenue cannot be responsible for the nature of the decisions that charities make about how to invest their funds. We have deliberately gone to considerable lengths to allow charities the opportunity to arrange their portfolios in such a way that they maximise the benefits to themselves.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): The hon. Lady rightly confirms what my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) said about 1996, when the Revenue confirmed that the tax would not be levied on the charity's investment, and she rightly confirms that this month, Ministers received a letter. Will she give the House her view on what my hon. Friend said about the chairman of the Revenue, Mr. Montagu, informing the charity that six months ago, Ministers knew the effects of what they were doing on the charity's investment?

Mrs. Liddell: The hon. Gentleman may not have been present during debates on the previous Finance Bill when these matters were extensively debated. The hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb), with his technical expertise, has long waxed eloquent on these matters. We recognised at that time that there would be an impact on charities, which is why preferential treatments for charities were built into that legislation to give them an opportunity to rearrange their portfolios in such a way that they could maximise the benefits to themselves.

That was a rational and clear-cut way in which to behave, given that an anomaly in the taxation system had to be corrected. It was the Conservative Government who began the process of the correction of tax credits. Therefore, one regrets that the decisions that the Thalidomide Trust took in relation to its investments have meant that it was liable for more tax than it thought. At the end of the day, however, the advice given to the Thalidomide Trust by the Revenue related to a specific inquiry, before the election of this Government, about whether the trust was becoming involved in a tax avoidance measure.

The Conservative case is not well made in relation to this matter. The Government, in giving charities the opportunity to seek independent advice on how they should place their investments, gave charities as much opportunity as possible to take the right kind of advice so that they could configure their portfolios in the most appropriate way. Therefore, I cannot accept the new clause, because it would mean making a one-off provision merely to take into account a single sort of investment. Charities will be able to find a range of secure and productive homes for their money. I urge the hon. Gentleman to withdraw new clause 16 so that we can continue with the consensus that we have enjoyed in respect of this important part of the Bill.

Mr. Fallon: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In respect of amendments Nos. 53 and 54, may I tell the Economic Secretary that she is, as we know, a hard lady? We have tried to put our point three times, and each time she has resisted, so I shall happily withdraw it.

In respect of new clause 16 and the problems that the Thalidomide Trust faces, her response was not at all satisfactory. First, she suggested that there were inaccuracies in what I said. I made it clear that the advice from the Revenue was given in December 1996. There is no dispute about that: I have the words, and I quoted them, so I hope that she will withdraw any suggestion that I was implying that the advice was given in a different December.

Mrs. Liddell: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has clarified the situation, and I am happy to accept his point. If I have misunderstood him, I am happy to withdraw my remarks, but I hope that he will withdraw his remarks about the Government not being concerned about the matter, and about Ministers failing to respond, given that we received the letter only on 22 June.

Mr. Fallon: I shall deal with that point in a moment, but let me make it clear that I said at the start of my remarks that the date was December 1996, and it was. I am glad that the Economic Secretary has withdrawn the suggestion that that was inaccurate.

Ministers may have been informed about the issue only on 22 June; so were we, but we have been doing something about it. We raised the issue at Question Time last week, and have had a new clause drafted and debated within seven days of receiving the Thalidomide Trust's letter. The hon. Lady, with all her officials in the Treasury, could have tabled a new clause, so it is nonsense to suggest that she has not had time to consider the matter.

Mrs. Liddell: I am sorry, but I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is still obscuring the main point. I am not saying that the Government have not had time to consider the point. My general point is that we received correspondence from the Thalidomide Trust on 22 June; my substantive point relates to the fact that the new clause would introduce a narrow change for a specific sort of investment. That is the substance of my remarks and, for that reason, I ask hon. Members to oppose the new clause, if the hon. Gentleman will not withdraw it.

Mr. Fallon: The Economic Secretary is now playing for time and flannelling. The plain fact is that she is not prepared to do anything in respect of the Thalidomide Trust. She has confessed that this is the only case of which the Treasury is aware; if it is the only case, it is a good one. For the sake of £70,000 for one of the most deserving charities, which has been taken away by the Government, I ask my hon. Friends to support the new clause.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 171, Noes 279.

New clause 18

CAPITAL ALLOWANCES FOR SEA GOING VESSELS

'After subsection (6) of section 38B of the Capital Allowances Act 1990 (which provides for expenditure excluded from the application of the Chapter), there shall be inserted the following subsection:—

"(7) For the purposes of subsection (3)(a) above, a ship shall not be an offshore installation if it is a floating production storage and offtake unit or drillship being a mobile vessel engaged in the exploration, exploitation, storage or transportation of mineral resources".'.—[Mr. Burnett.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Burnett: On this melancholy evening, I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The object of the new clause is to remove the uncertainty and discrimination that have impacted on the British shipping industry and our shipyards since the Finance Act 1997—the last Conservative Finance Act. That Act reduced from 25 to 6 per cent. the rate of writing-down allowances on what are defined as long-life assets.

I am delighted to declare a constituency interest. My constituency is fortunate enough to contain Appledore Shipbuilders. The company has a skilled and dedicated management and work force; it is a company of not just regional but national and, indeed, international importance. The House will be surprised to learn that it is one of only two medium-sized shipyards left in the country, the other being Ferguson in Port Glasgow. I am happy to see that the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) is present: he has a great interest in, and much knowledge of, the shipbuilding industry, and many of his constituents work at Ferguson.

British shipyards need orders, and they need them now. In February 1997, when he was shadow Minister for energy and industry, the current Minister for Science, Energy and Industry—the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle)—spoke of the Labour party's positive vision for the United Kingdom sector of the continental shelf, and of the vital industries and jobs that support that sector. One of those crucial industries is shipbuilding, which is heavily dependent on the construction of floating production storage and offtake facilities—FPSOs—and other assets such as drill ships.

The capital allowance rules in the Finance Act 1997, which reduced capital allowances for long-life assets to 6 per cent., are on machinery and plant which, when new, are expected to have a useful economic life of at least 25 years. Sea-going ships continue to qualify for the 25 percent. writing-down allowances. Unfortunately, for these purposes "sea-going ship" excludes any ship that is or would be an offshore installation under the Mineral Workings (Offshore Installations) Act 1971.

According to the previous Financial Secretary, the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), ships and railway assets were to be excluded from the long-life assets rule to promote investments in shipping and the rail industry.

[Mr. Burnett]

Before the Finance Act 1997, British shipyards were becoming increasingly dependent on the offshore oil and gas industry for work. Last year, Harland and Wolff was constructing one FPSO, two drill ships and two rig conversions. Appledore was constructing two offshore vessels, Ferguson four offshore vessels and Kvaerner in Govan six offshore vessels. A total of 17 offshore vessels were under construction last year in British shipyards.

That is important work, but it is in jeopardy as a result of the restricted capital allowances for offshore sea-going vessels. Under the new rules, capital allowances on long-life assets are extremely meagre—6 per cent. on a reducing-balance basis. Therefore, for every £100 invested, 6 per cent., or £6, is claimable in year one. In year two, it is not the £6 again; it is 6 per cent. of what is left over—£94. It takes an age to write off the cost of the asset for tax purposes. It is not done even on a straight-line basis—that is, 6 per cent. of the total sum in each year.

Therefore, although bringing the allowances for the offshore vessels back to the old basis would be far better, it would still be only 25 per cent. on a reducing-balance basis—in year one, for every £100 invested, £25 would qualify; in year two, 25 per cent. of the residual sum, which is £75, would qualify, and so on. With my new clause, it is still going to take at least eight years or so to write off the asset for tax purposes.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): The hon. Gentleman is making an important point and a significant speech because the long-life asset provisions of the Finance Act 1997 are damaging the offshore rig industry, and so on, and also doing considerable damage to the air transport industry. He will be aware that I introduced an Adjournment debate on that subject. I hoped that the Liberal Democrat party might have pursued that area of interest, which is crucial not just for air transport, but for the air manufacturing industry.

Mr. Burnett: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. He is correct, and I am delighted to associate myself and my party with his concerns about further problems in relation to the aircraft industry; but the new clause relates to sea-going industries. If he wishes to table an amendment—I am afraid that it is probably too late now, but it might be possible for next year's Finance Bill—I am sure that we will see fit to support it.

The Institute for Fiscal Studies has cast doubt on whether the projected yields from the introduction of long-life assets would ever be achieved. In any event, the new clause will account only for a small fraction of the anticipated revenue. I hope that the House will support it.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): I offer my compliments to the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett). Speaking as an ex-shipyard worker, a shipwright by trade, I confirm that the yard in his constituency, Appledore, is first class. Unfortunately, from time to time, it has won orders at the expense of shipyards in my neck of the woods—the lower and upper Clyde—but it is an important new clause.

My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary knows well the two yards on the Clyde that the hon. Member mentioned—Ferguson on the lower Clyde and Kvaerner in Govan, Glasgow; some of her constituents work in both yards. I reckon that some several hundred of my constituents, highly skilled workers, are employed at Ferguson and Kvaerner. For that constituency reason, I am keen to offer my sympathy to the new clause.

It is important that owners of offshore supply vessels such as those that the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon mentioned, are given support because, in fairness to them, they almost always place their orders in UK shipyards, unlike many other UK vessel owners, who go overseas, where there are often hidden subsidies that enable those yards to secure orders against our yards. Those offshore support vessel owners have a fine record in placing their orders in our constituencies. I wish that they would place more orders in mine than in the hon. Gentleman's, but we defend our own corners.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned 17 such vessels. Kvaerner, which is notable for its specialist skills in the building of liquefied petroleum gas tankers, is now building these vessels. If I had had the opportunity, I would have tabled an amendment to the new clause to the effect that no support should be given to shipowners who place their orders overseas. The House will have to forgive me for being ethnocentric about this, but I think that we should look after our own shipyards. Whenever I have met shipowners, I have told them that, if they are seeking our assistance to argue the case in the House for the kind of financial help that they receive in other countries—especially the Scandinavian countries—they have to give us an assurance in return that they will make every attempt to place their orders in our yards.

"a floating production storage and offtake unit".

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Harland and Wolff in Belfast, which is an important employer in that bedevilled Province. It employs about 1,800 men and women, I think. In my constituency, UIE of Clydebank is converting such a vessel—and it is a vessel. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that it is more than a production platform. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take that on board—I should not have said that, but I hope that the House will forgive the pun—because these contracts are superb contracts to win. Let me give an example. The vessel being built now in Greenock is employing upwards of 1,000 highly skilled men. I hope that UIE of Clydebank will secure more of those orders.

I can see that the Government Whip is getting a bit anxious. Perhaps he is gloomy because his team went down tonight. I cannot do anything about that, being a Scots Member of Parliament, but he has my commiserations.

Surely some sympathy must be shown to shipowners who place their orders in UK shipyards. We all benefit if they do. It should be emphasised that it is not only maritime communities that benefit from these orders but communities miles away from the coastline—for example, the communities that provide the electronic equipment that goes into making these vessels. I simply plead for sympathy from the Minister, and I hope that my brief speech pleases the grumpy Whip.

Mrs. Liddell: This has been a brief but very interesting debate. I commend the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) for raising this issue. I especially commend my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) for his contribution. As he knows, I live but two miles from the Ferguson yard in Port Glasgow and about six miles from the Kvaerner yard in Govan. My constituents do indeed work in both yards.

The first few years of my working life were connected with trying to secure the long-term future of shipbuilding on the Clyde. As a young economist, and with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, I spent probably two to three years dealing with the problems being experienced on the Clyde as a consequence of the rundown of shipbuilding and with the problems of Upper Clyde Shipbuilders. I therefore approach the issue with some sympathy, but I am not able to accept the new clause. [Interruption.] I hope that hon. Gentlemen will allow me to finish this serious point. I am not able to accept the new clause, but I hope that I may be able to provide some information that is of comfort to the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon and to my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde.

The aim of the long-life asset measure was to improve the neutrality of the tax system by bringing the tax treatment of such assets more closely into line with the actual rate of depreciation. Ships and railways were both exempted until 2010 because of the special circumstances in each of those sectors. Long-life assets qualify for capital allowances at a rate of 6 per cent. a year, whereas, as the hon. Gentleman said, other plant and machinery qualify for allowances at a rate of 25 per cent. a year.

The exclusion was aimed at the merchant shipping sector, and it would be very difficult to extend it to cover floating production storage and off-take units or drilling rigs. Annual capital allowances at 25 per cent. would write off nearly half the cost of an asset in the first two years, and three quarters of the cost in the first five years—which clearly is not neutral treatment for assets that have a working life of more than 25 years. The capital allowances would outstrip by far the actual depreciation rate.

If a floating production storage and off-take unit or a drilling rig has an expected economic life of more than 25 years, it is clearly right that it should not qualify for the 25 per cent. capital allowances. Conversely, if the asset has an expected economic life of less than 25 years, it will already be outside the scope of the long-life asset rules.

This may be where I can give the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon some comfort. We have not seen any current evidence that the provisions are discouraging investment in the North sea. However, the Inland Revenue has made it clear to the oil industry that it is prepared to agree in advance the economic life of assets that are used in the industry, and that each asset will be considered individually, to arrive at a reasonable estimate of expected economic life. Given the overall aim of the long-life asset rules, that is an appropriate way of dealing with the units that he mentioned—floating production storage and off-take units and drilling rigs.

I hope that, with that comfort, the hon. Gentleman might choose to withdraw his new clause. If not, I regret to say that I shall have to ask the House to resist it.

Mr. Burnett: Liberal Democrat Members are grateful for the Minister's comments. The problem is that, even using my amended capital allowance system, it would take a considerable time—eight years—to ride out for tax purposes the cost of an asset. That is a long time. Even with my amendment, the allowances available in the United Kingdom compared with those available abroad put us right at the back of queue. We do not sufficiently encourage our shipbuilding and shipping industries. It is with regret that we have to force the matter to a vote.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

The House divided: Ayes 37, Noes 272.

RAF Northolt

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert Ainsworth.]

11.23 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the future of RAF Northolt. To many, not least to my constituents, it is incredible that the future of such an historic air force station—which fulfils its current role so well, and which is so warmly appreciated by those who work there, live nearby or benefit from its services—should be called into question.

It is little wonder that RAF Northolt is appreciated. Founded as a Royal Flying Corps station in 1915, it was in the thick of the battle of Britain, No. 303 Polish Squadron achieving more kills than any squadron in Air Chief Marshal Dowding's order of battle. Today, its proud traditions are maintained and heightened by the presence of No. 32 (The Royal) Squadron, which has assumed the duties of the Queen's Flight and provides invaluable communications flying for Ministers, service chiefs, senior civil servants and diplomats—as well as, of course, for the royal family.

Nearby national and North Atlantic Treaty Organisation headquarters, like those at Northwood, High Wycombe and Bentley Priory, benefit from having such an Air Force-controlled facility on the doorstep, as do those in the royal palaces, Whitehall, Westminster, allied embassies and military staffs who need a secure specialist unit and a transport facility of their own on which they can totally rely, not only in peacetime but in time of national emergency or war—a unit that will always give priority to their requirements. It should be remembered that RAF Northolt houses other distinguished units, including No. 1 Maritime headquarters unit of the Royal Auxiliary Air Force and the air information development unit.

There has been a tendency for RAF Northolt to acquire additional units as small military establishments in London are closed, which makes good economic and military sense. It is the happy partnership between the station and the local community that makes RAF Northolt so special. People remember well the late 1940s and early 1950s when Northolt was an airport for London, and the home of British European Airways. However, the jet era is very different from the age of piston-engined DC3 Pionairs and Vikings, and local people definitely do not want RAF Northolt to become a civil airport again—ever.

The physical constraints to the aerodrome are far too great. I have seen an old photograph of a twin piston-engined aircraft that crashed on to a Ruislip rooftop. The driver of a van on the A40 last August—whose vehicle was struck by a Spanish Lear jet which overran the 5,400 ft runway—will not forget the experience. I expect that he was glad that it was not a big airliner.

The present co-existence of military flights with a strictly limited number of civil movements is tolerated by the local community. Any relaxation in the limitations for civil aircraft will be unacceptable to local people, and they and their elected representatives, at local and national level, have repeatedly said so to the Government with complete consistency and unanimity, regardless of party affiliation.

The limits on civil flights at Northolt are from 0800 to 2000 local time; by prior permission only, with a maximum of 28 movements a day, Monday to Friday; no noisy aircraft; no aircraft with more than 30 seats; and, above all, no scheduled services. Those sensible restrictions have been upheld by successive Defence and Transport Ministers. The only change was a six-month trial, from 1 October 1996 to 31 March 1997, of an 0700 hours opening for civil flights, after which trial the old regime was wisely restored.

There have been periodic scares over the years. The Transport Committee, in its report on UK airport capacity in the 1995-96 Session, said:

"RAF Northolt might be employed as a satellite of Heathrow which, because of its small size, would provide capacity which could only be used by small aircraft of the sort that, particularly on UK regional flights, are being crowded out of Heathrow. We realise that ATC problems make intensive use of Northolt's existing runways difficult as it is near Heathrow and its runways are not fully parallel to those at Heathrow; flight paths of aircraft therefore cross those of aircraft using Heathrow.

However it was suggested that it would be possible to build a new runway at Northolt, parallel to those at Heathrow, which as far as ATC was concerned could be treated as a third Heathrow runway. We support the use of Northolt as a 'feeder reliever' airport for Heathrow. The Government should make funds available to NATS to study how the ATC difficulties of using Northolt could be overcome. Redhill aerodrome might also have a useful role as a 'feeder-reliever' for Gatwick."

The Committee's wholly unrealistic recommendations were lifted uncritically from a memorandum to the Committee from SH and E Air Transport Consultants, which amazingly proposed in paragraph 5.11 of its submission:

"Taken together the development of Redhill for Gatwick and Northolt for Heathrow would increase the capacity of the premier London airports by 30 million passengers per annum or more."

I wonder which commercial interest inspired SH and E's wild hyperbole. It proposed in paragraph 5.6:

"The eventual aim would be for both Northolt and Redhill to be marketed as an integral part of Heathrow and Gatwick . . . By way of illustration the distance between the two would be approximately five miles or eight minutes by road."

In fact, the journey through the rush-hour traffic between Heathrow and Northolt can easily be half an hour or more.

No wonder the Government's official observations in House of Commons paper 644, on the Select Committee's report, were dismissive of the Committee's proposals. They said:

"The Government does not consider that Northolt is a suitable site for the development of a civil airport on the scale that would be necessary to provide significant relief to Heathrow. It does not therefore consider it worthwhile to invite NATS to undertake a study of ATC constraints. The Government considers that Northolt does have the potential to provide useful if limited facilities for business aviation, and in parallel with this response it will set out its plans to increase the attractiveness of the facilities for business aviation, taking account of local interests. An earlier consultation on the possibility of a civil enclave for business aviation suggested that privatisation is not likely to be a realistic proposition for such a small-scale and limited civil operation."

Those were the observations of a Conservative Administration.

There matters should have rested. Luton airport, now with commercial management, will expand its already growing traffic for airline and business traffic alike, while in a few days' time, a public inquiry will begin into opening Farnborough, supported by Rushmoor council, to

[Mr. John Wilkinson]

21,000 air transport movements a year from Farnborough's long runway. That is three times the current annual limit of movements for RAF Northolt, with its very short runway.

I took a delegation of Labour councillors from Northolt's local authority—Hillingdon—to meet the Minister for Transport in London on 9 February this year. In a briefing note on the civil use of RAF Northolt, Hillingdon council stated:

"Hillingdon is opposed to any further increase in civil use at Northolt including a permanent increase in operating hours from 7 am, any civil use at weekends, an increase above the 7,000 annual civil transport movements, an increase in the size of civil aircraft using Northolt over 30 seats."

One might expect a Labour Government to accede to representations from a Labour council, but it was merely told to await the outcome of the strategic defence review. We heard later, not then, that the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions had sponsored consultants to do a study of business aviation in the south-east of England.

Then Stagecoach, which owns Prestwick airport, rolled on to the scene this summer with proposals put to the Transport Committee which, if the press is to be believed, resurrected the proposals for Northolt previously submitted to, and regurgitated by, the Transport Committee two years ago—proposals that were rightly rejected by the Government for sound technical and environmental reasons.

Interestingly, following my oral defence question to the Minister for the Armed Forces, whom I see on the Front Bench—a question about RAF Northolt put on 22 June—I received an unsolicited letter dated 26 June from the chairman of the European Business Aviation Association, Mr. Brian Humphries:

"Like you, we do not want Northolt to be developed and expanded to take larger aircraft and scheduled services. As such, we are totally opposed to the kind of plans which Stagecoach are allegedly putting forward to turn Northolt into a satellite of Heathrow."

The future of RAF Northolt is a test case. The USA has a military air force base, Andrews, beside the capital, Washington DC. France has Villacoublay beside Paris. RAF Northolt should similarly be retained with no change to its status or role.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): I have received a similar letter from Brian Humphries, whom the hon. Gentleman quotes correctly. What is your opinion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman must realise that he is now addressing the Chair.

Mr. Pound: I do beg your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would the hon. Gentleman care to comment on the other question posed in the letter? It asks: if military use is declining, what would be the possibility of an increase of executive jet usage of the airport?

Mr. Wilkinson: The letter did not put it in those terms; it mentioned spare capacity, and I took that to mean that the 7,000 permitted civil movements a year were not fully taken up.

The environment of west London is under constant threat, with seemingly endless traffic jams, much excessive ambient noise, and insidious urbanisation of the few open spaces that remain. RAF Northolt and the small patches of green belt alongside are about the last remaining semi-rural areas left between Marble Arch and the M25.

Unemployment in my constituency is the lowest in Greater London—jobs are not, at least for the time being, a problem. Preserving an acceptable residential environment is, however, a constant challenge. RAF Northolt has seen off the dangerous challenge of the Luftwaffe in the past. The threat is more insidious today: the ambitions of those who want to impose on the site a three-runway London airport. It would take in a significant chunk of west London, regardless of the wishes of local people, and regardless of the irreparable damage to a swathe of residential Middlesex which would ensue.

I beg to suggest to the Minister that he keep RAF Northolt as it is. That would best suit the interests of the Ministry that he represents, and the interests of my constituents and those who live around the airfield.

The Minister for the Armed Forces (Dr. John Reid): I always listen with interest to the remarks of the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) on matters relating to the Royal Air Force, but I listened with particular interest this evening, and at Defence questions on Monday 22 June, when he drew attention to the subject of the future of Royal Air Force Northolt. Obviously, Northolt and its future are matters of great interest to him: he is a staunch defender of and doughty fighter for his constituency interests, and he has wider concerns about the operational effectiveness of the Royal Air Force—in which he has a deep interest—and the contribution that Northolt makes to it.

The views of the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood on the subject are by no means confined to one hon. Member or to one party. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner), whose constituents are on the flight path, has expressed similar concerns to me, and obviously my hon. Friends the Members for Ealing, North (Mr. Pound) and for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) and a number of other hon. Members have similar feelings.

Mr. John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington): As my hon. Friend said, this is not an isolated concern of the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson); it is a concern of all the Hillingdon Members of Parliament. My hon. Friend needs to confer with his colleagues in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions because, in my constituency, we are facing the environmental blight of the potential development of Northolt, sandwiched with the environmental threat of terminal 5, and even a third runway, obliterating the villages in the south of my constituency. All those factors need to be taken into account in any decision on the future of Northolt airport. We need to take into account the environmental degradation of our constituencies by the airport industry.

Dr. Reid: I shall mention the wider consideration of those matters that is being undertaken by the Department that my hon. Friend mentioned.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House know that, as was said, the principal task of Royal Air Force Northolt is to support the requirement for operational communications flying and VIP flying. As the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood said, that requirement is met by No. 32 (The Royal) Squadron. As he also said, several other units are based at RAF Northolt, including a bomb disposal unit, the headquarters of the south-east region of the air cadets, the aeronautical information documents unit and one or two units which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. That is not all that takes place. In line with my Department's policy of public access to the defence estate, RAF Northolt allows civil use of its irreducible spare capacity—the capacity which it is necessary to keep on the books and in the ambit of the defence budget, but which is not fully used at all times.

I am pleased to report that the civil use of RAF Northolt also generates significant receipts for the defence budget and, obviously, for the taxpayer. Indeed, for the financial year 1997-98, receipts amounting to about £948,000 were generated by civil use at Northolt—a more than 20 per cent. increase on the previous year.

I hope that the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood will be assured that my Department is well aware of concerns about the impact of flying—especially civil aviation—on the local environment at RAF Northolt, in light of responses which I gave him when he raised the matter previously. Indeed, in view of those concerns, the Ministry of Defence, as he said, has restricted civil use of RAF Northolt to the hours between 8 am and 8 pm, mainly on weekdays. Civil use at weekends is allowed only when the station is open for operational reasons.

We have also set a limit of 7,000 civil movements in the year. That figure includes business aviation and other civil operations, but excludes movements on Ministry of Defence or other Government business. The latest figures that we have show that, during 1997, there were 6,958 such civil movements—slightly fewer than the number of military movements in and out of Northolt last year. The care that the Department has taken in those restrictions is testimony to our awareness of the impact on the local community and the feelings of local people.

In addition to restrictions on the times at which civilian aircraft may operate and the number of movements allowed, we allow only quieter civil aircraft to use Northolt. Only civil aircraft that can carry a maximum of 30 passengers are normally allowed use of the airfield.

On the main question about the future of RAF Northolt, it is true that, as part of the Government's strategic defence review, we have been considering the future of Northolt as an RAF station and the wider implications. That should not be taken as a unique study, as the strategic defence review, the results of which we shall hear in the near future, was a scrutiny of all defence assets. There is no sense in which RAF Northolt was chosen again for consideration. It was part of a wide-ranging scrutiny by Ministers and officials.

Although it would be premature to comment in detail on the outcome of the defence review, no options have been discounted as regards RAF Northolt. Much work remains to be done in considering them, and no imminent decisions on RAF Northolt are likely to be sprung on the House.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge): The Minister can gauge the strength of feeling from the number of hon. Members present who represent surrounding areas. Can he give us an assurance that, if a decision was taken to change the status of RAF Northolt, there would be wide public consultation? That would show the strength of feeling against any change in the current status of RAF Northolt.

Dr. Reid: I know that the hon. Gentleman has an interest in the subject, and we have discussed these matters before. I shall come to such an assurance shortly.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. McDonnell) pointed out in his intervention, there are many factors to be taken into account before proposals can be considered. For my Department there is the work, not only of the strategic defence review, but of the strategic development plan for the defence estate in the Greater London area, which will include RAF Northolt. There is also the work that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions has set in hand on business aviation in the south-east, and the forthcoming integrated transport White Paper that will provide a framework for subsequent work on airports policy.

Those various factors mean that early proposals on the future of RAF Northolt are highly unlikely. I can assure hon. Members that the concerns of the local community will be an important consideration in all this on-going work. It could not be otherwise.

The hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood mentioned the trials held between 1 October 1996 and 31 March 1997, in the last year of the previous Conservative Government. A trial was conducted into extending RAF Northolt's opening hours. The Ministry of Defence and the Department of Transport had jointly identified possible changes to working arrangements at RAF Northolt that might improve services offered to users, in view of pressures on existing runway capacity.

The hon. Gentleman identified the changes that were made during that period. The opening of the airport at 7 am on weekday mornings, instead of the usual time of 8 am, attracted 153 additional civil movements over the six-month trial period. Eighty of those movements were new business, and the remaining 73 were movements that would otherwise have taken place within standard opening hours.

Consideration of much wider aspects is now taking place. I know that it will raise concerns, and I am trying to assuage the fears of local Members and their constituents that anything will be done without maximum consultation, or that anything is likely to be done imminently. The consideration may take several months, perhaps until the beginning of next year, and possible effects over a long time scale are being examined.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North) rose—

Dr. Reid: Before I give way, I stress that any emerging proposals will be subject to full consultation not only with local individuals and Members of Parliament but with those local authorities and local communities that could potentially be affected. In the meantime—I hope that this assures hon. Members—I am prepared to guarantee tonight that, while the work is going on, there will be no increase in the current ceiling of 7,000 civil movements a year. I am also prepared to guarantee that the airfield's opening hours will remain as they are now and will not be extended. Any change countenanced at any stage would involve the fullest consultation.

Mr. Gardiner: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way on that point and for delaying my intervention. That guarantee is extremely welcome to my constituents from Roe Green, Kingsbury, Kenton and Sudbury who are affected by aircraft movements and who have made representations to me. The Minister will be aware of the question that I tabled about the reduction of the defence estate in London. I know that he is aware also of the response that his Department provided to me earlier today. Will he give an assurance that the existing studies—particularly those relating to RAF Northolt—will be taken into account in the strategic defence review and in the reduction of the defence estates review in London?

Dr. Reid: I assure my hon. Friend that, if those studies were not taken into account, they would be the only studies in the past 10 years that were not involved in the strategic defence review scrutiny. I assure my hon. Friend that we have spent many days, weeks and indeed months—up until, literally, the past few hours—compiling the finest details of the strategic defence review. Other matters, such as this one, will emanate from it and will require further study. I know that my hon. Friend received a response this morning from the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, my hon. Friend the Member for Warley (Mr. Spellar), and I hope that that has gone some way towards allaying his fears.

We are well aware of the opposition of local authorities and local communities to extended opening, and we have taken careful note of the representations that they have made about the matter. I repeat that no decision has been taken to extend the arrangements under the trial to a more permanent footing.

As I told the House at Defence questions last Monday, my Department has received a number of unsolicited approaches about the use of spare capacity at RAF Northolt. Most of those approaches were very tentative. I have answered written questions about the specific approach that was raised, but I reassure all hon. Members that no one from the Ministry of Defence—or any other Department, to my knowledge—has been going around soliciting offers for the extension or the transformation of RAF Northolt.

I hope that my few remarks and the guarantees that I have given tonight have assuaged people's fears and assured the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood, and others who are deeply interested in the issue, that the fullest consideration will be given to their views if any change were countenanced. No decision is likely in the near future—we are thinking perhaps about the end of this year or the beginning of next year—and, even after that, there will be maximum consultation.

In the interim, there will be no change to the hours in the morning as per the last trial, and no extension to the number of civil movements. I hope that the fact that I have given those guarantees and assurances and the spirit in which my Department has acted is testimony to how seriously we take the hon. Gentleman's points.

Gap Year Students

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dowd.]

9.34 am

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate gap year students. One of the great advantages of being a Member of Parliament is that one can occasionally highlight an issue that is not always in the public mind, and this is certainly one such issue. I congratulate those hon. Members who have survived the tribulations of last night on making it here this morning in one piece. I hope that we can score a few goals on behalf of students, but that is in the hands of the Minister.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Dr. Kim Howells): I am a rugby player.

Mr. St. Aubyn: That sounds ominous. Perhaps the hand of Government will be as effective as the hand of God was on another occasion.

First, I shall define gap year students. This month, if their A-level results are good enough, many students will make plans to go on to the university of their choice in the autumn. Every year, some school leavers decide to take a year out from their education programme to widen their experience and find out more about the world. Those are predominantly gap year students.

I have tried hard to get exact figures on the number of such students, but there are little data in this area. Most estimates show that 20,000 to 30,000 school leavers who intend to go to university take a gap year. However, as I shall show, a greater number may fall into that category. We should also consider students who enter university and meet students who took a gap year. They may put a gap year in their plans between leaving university and starting a full-time career.

I should declare an interest because I was a gap year student a few years ago. It was a tremendous experience, thanks to the organisation Project Trust. It was first in the field, following the decision by Voluntary Service Overseas to concentrate only on graduates. The trust started 30 years ago, and has developed programmes throughout the world specifically to enable school leavers to spend nine months to a year on structured projects that they had identified. In those 30 years, the trust has sent more than 4,000 school leavers abroad, and it has had great success. Those who go abroad for a year take on a big commitment, and the success rate says a great deal for the assessment, back-up, training and knowledge that the trust has developed.

One way in which gap year students gain experience is by self-selection. Perhaps that is why relatively few examples of poor experiences by gap year students come to light in the media. For students, it is a self-selecting experience, because the Project Trust base is on the island of Coll: applicants have to go from Glasgow to Oban to catch the island ferry early in the morning. If my memory is correct, it leaves before 7 o'clock. Anyone who faces those rigours must be willing to spend a year abroad.

The image of gap year students has perhaps limited the number who come forward. When I was applying for a project, I had in mind working on a sheep farm in Australia, on a ranch in South America with racehorses, or some such idea that one has at that stage. It was only when I was on the training and induction programme that I became interested in doing volunteer work, and I ended up as a care worker in a children's home.

In many ways, that was a life-determining opportunity for me. The striking fact—as the evidence of the Project Trust and other organisations suggests—is that that experience, if it is well structured and successful, does make a difference to the rest of volunteers' lives. Therefore, although we may be talking about only a small proportion of school leavers—the Universities and Colleges Admission Service estimates that only 6 per cent. of university applicants currently decide to take a gap year—the ones who do stand to benefit tremendously if the experience is right.

The other factor to bear in mind is that the nature of students taking gap year opportunities has changed. Seventy per cent. of the Project Trust's volunteers come from the state sector, and only 30 per cent. from the independent sector. The idea of the year off as the rich kid's luxury has gone. It is an opportunity that is and should remain open to all school leavers. However, there are problems.

The grandfather of overseas volunteering is Voluntary Service Overseas. Earlier this year, it reported that the number of its projects has had to be reduced by 10 per cent. because of a fall in applications. It sends about 2,000 people abroad on projects. That is at a time when, in the United States, with a $50 million grant from the United States Government, the number of Peace Corps volunteers—Peace Corps is a programme that was directly inspired by the example of VSO—has doubled to 10,000 a year.

There is other evidence that there has been a change in attitudes in our country, which we must do something to address. There is evidence that the number of people aged between 18 and 24 who are involved in any volunteering activity in this country has fallen in recent years. In 1991, 55 per cent. of those in that age group were involved in volunteering. Last year, that fell to 43 per cent., a drop of 1.4 million volunteers.

The new Government came to power promising the giving age, but for that age group it has become the taking age. One of the most worrying aspects of the current situation is the great increase in the burden on 18 to 24-year-olds implied by the Government's new proposals for tuition fees and for taking away the maintenance grant. I have seen correspondence between the Minister and some of the organisations in this sector making the case that those from less well-off backgrounds will not have to pay tuition fees, but, as we all know, that is only part of the package. The other part is that the maintenance grant will be abolished, so, when they leave university, those from less well-off backgrounds will find that the debt on their shoulders will be higher than the debt of those from well-off backgrounds.

Therefore, across the board, members of that important, in many ways idealistic, age group who may want to take part in community activities, will find that the burden imposed by the Government deters them. Instead of spending a year doing voluntary activity, whether in this country or abroad, they feel that they must spend that time building their savings to help them to pay for their tuition at university.

That has clear consequences. One is that, if school leavers want to enjoy the benefits of a gap year, it is now more important than ever that they do so in a structured way, through an organisation that provides a well-founded experience. Not only will that be their best chance of ensuring that they gain the most from that experience, but, when they come on to the job market, it will be a plus with their prospective employers.

A recent survey showed that more than 50 per cent. of employers are more likely to choose a candidate who has had gap year experience; I am grateful to The Guardian of 12 August for that survey. Community Service Volunteers—the domestic equivalent of VSO—which in any year has 1,200 volunteers on its programmes, has done its own survey, which found that more than 50 per cent. of human resource directors in companies it questioned would prefer to take on an employee who had been involved in voluntary work, compared with one who had just been on a backpacking holiday of their own design.

Therefore, it is important that those programmes have a structure. There are five key issues that students and potential students should be looking for when they go on a programme. First, they should be on a programme that provides for assessment of the school leaver. That assessment will guide the school leaver into the right sort of project to suit them.

Secondly, a well-grounded programme will ensure that the projects to which the school leavers go have a correct and well-prepared specification. Thirdly, the organisation will provide sufficient training for school leavers, so that, when they go on their project, they genuinely deliver benefits to their host country and to the charity or school where they may be working, rather than becoming involved in an experience that may, for want of a better word, be nothing more than aid tourism.

Fourthly, when school leavers are on a project, that will be their first experience of being away from home for an extended period. It is important that pastoral care is available to school leavers in the country where they work. Again, the organisation should not only be able to show that it provides pastoral care, but, if the political situation becomes threatening—in many of these countries, there is often political instability—it should be aware of that and able to take school leavers out of a country as a last resort, in good time and with minimum fuss.

Lastly—in many ways, this is almost as important as all the rest—there should be proper debriefing for school leavers when they return home. There is an element of culture shock in going abroad. There is more than an element of reverse culture shock when school leavers come back to this country, particularly if they have been on a posting lasting between six months and a year.

That is why the cost of the best programmes is not cheap. Project Trust charges its volunteers £3,500 for their year's experience abroad. Gap Activity, which has been going for 25 years, is another well-established provider in the sector; it sends around 1,200 school leavers abroad a year and charges, all told, about £1,500 typically for a six-month experience abroad. Those figures sound high, but, in the case of those organisations and the other better organisations in the sector, that money is raised through sponsorship.

The organisations not only help school leavers to find sponsors, but give them some training in how to win sponsorship. The training is a part of the programmes' development of the individual, from which school leavers benefit. School leavers are successful, and achieve their sponsorship. Moreover, major British companies greatly value the results produced by the programmes, which provide volunteers with a leadership development programme as they are maturing as individuals. The required money is therefore forthcoming.

As the numbers of those going into higher education increases, and as awareness of the gap year experience and opportunity have grown, so organisations offering programmes have proliferated. It is estimated that more than 70 organisations now offer some gap year experience. However, the programmes are entirely unregulated. I shall deal with that point in more detail later.

I came across one company, for example, that employs in the United Kingdom only eight staff, who are responsible each year for almost 800 postings, lasting less than three months, for which they charge a total of about £2,000. Such programmes clearly do not provide the same value for money as those provided by the other, good organisations that I have mentioned.

The worst organisations do not provide training, or even an assessment of the school leaver and his or her suitability for a post. The image of the United Kingdom in countries where gap year students are sent will be tarnished if they show up for a few months, do not know why they are there, and perhaps return to the United Kingdom confused in their own minds, whereas people in the country involved simply think, "That's just another aid tourist who has been through our patch." That is not the image we want to project abroad.

Dr. Howells: Will the hon. Gentleman do the House and the country a favour by naming that company?

Mr. St. Aubyn: There are several such organisations, and I shall give the Minister their details later.

Such organisations pose a problem and have to be checked out. The question is whether we should regulate or offer guidance. The case against regulation is that volunteers are, as I said, a group of school leavers who are self-selecting. They have a self-awareness, and a "get up and go" that will stand them in good stead. Moreover, if they are to go abroad, they will have to have their wits about them. The problem with regulation is that it would create an extra cost for the best organisations, without providing any better value in the experience they offer.

The United Kingdom regulates similar organisations.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): Regulation is one of the most important aspects of the hon. Gentleman's speech and of the point that he is trying to make. Does he accept that the appalling situation that developed after Louise Woodward went to the United States to take up a post without supervision, regulation or training shows that we have to include within guidelines not only traditional, university gap year students, but all young people who participate in a gap year experience?

Mr. St. Aubyn: The hon. Gentleman makes a very good point, and I shall certainly deal later with the Louise Woodward case.

The decision whether to regulate should be based on our experience in the United Kingdom. Until quite recently, expeditions in the UK were not regulated. Only the previous Government introduced the requirement that expeditions be regulated and use qualified staff. When those regulations were introduced, after a canoeing accident in Lulworth cove, there was a sharp drop in the number of applicants to all organisations, however well established and reputable, which put their futures at risk.

Senior and responsible organisations offering overseas gap year projects have serious concerns that, if regulations were to be introduced, a hiatus would be created during which they would suffer serious effects. Developing a specific project can take a very long time, and, once the project is up and running, it is important that the flow of able and committed volunteers continues. If the Government were to interrupt and jeopardise that flow by announcing the need for regulation, many organisations would have a difficult time keeping their show on the road.

Most of the most reputable and longest-standing organisations are charitable, and are consequently run on a very tight budget.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): The points that my hon. Friend is making are extremely important, very serious and valid. However, I am sure that he will agree that parents who are releasing their children into organisations that will send them to foreign lands have a very big responsibility to check out those organisations to which their children will be consigned.

Mr. St. Aubyn: My hon. Friend makes a very good point, which leads on to the main point of the debate.

If parents are to investigate programmes with due vigilance, and if schools are to allow organisations into their career evenings and access to children—often the point of contact is the school's careers officer—they must have guidelines on what to expect and consider. Issuing such guidelines is the role that I think should be played by the Minister and the Department for Education and Employment—not only to ensure that the best organisations thrive, and that those that do not offer a fair deal fall by the wayside, but to endorse the idea, if the Minister is prepared to do so, of the gap year experience.

Organisations such as Project Trust and Gap Action tell me that they often visit a school to find that the school's head and teachers have no concept of a gap year. Issuing guidelines to schools would raise consciousness of gap years, and broaden the group who think that the gap year experience might be for them.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): Issuing guidelines is an interesting idea. However, further to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), I should like to tell my hon. Friend of my own experience when my son wanted to go to Vietnam for his gap year. As a responsible parent, I sought to discover as much about the programme as I could, and found the Foreign Office extremely helpful. I suggest to my hon. Friend that he might include as one of his proposals to the Minister that the Foreign Office should itself investigate some of the organisations, and make its knowledge available to parents before their children go abroad.

Mr. St. Aubyn: My hon. Friend also makes a very good point. Perhaps I should say how much the organisations involved in sending school leavers abroad appreciate the back-up they receive from Government—not only from Foreign Office officials in the countries involved, in helping them to identify people living locally who are prepared to help; but, in extreme situations, from the Foreign Office in performing its general role of protecting all United Kingdom citizens in political hot spots. The Foreign Office has a role to play in all those circumstances.

The Department for International Development also is very much aware of the positive aspects of the organisations, and should have an input to the Minister's Department in drawing up helpful and constructive guidelines.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) mentioned the case of Louise Woodward. I am told that, when the phrase "gap year students" is mentioned to the Prime Minister, he immediately thinks of Louise Woodward. I have deferred mentioning her case until now, because I wanted to emphasise to the House that a much wider group of people is involved in the gap year experience. However, an unknown number of school leavers, who may not be going on to university, nevertheless want the gap year experience. They are being sent overseas without appropriate assessment, training or back-up, and thus run the risks which tragically led to the case involving Louise Woodward in the United States.

I am grateful to the House of Commons Library for the following figures. Although the official estimate is that about 20,000 to 30,000 school leavers take a gap year, in the current year 137,000 18-year-olds, 55,000 19-year-olds and 20,000 20-year-olds entered a university course. Clearly, a much larger group is entering university education later, perhaps having changed their minds after leaving school. They would benefit from guidelines about where they are going and with which organisation.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Most of the hon. Gentleman's remarks have focused on the gap year experience overseas. Does he agree that, before entering university or teacher training college, most students would benefit from a gap year even within the United Kingdom, and that steps should be taken to encourage that, because of the confidence that students gain from experience of the real world?

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I have deliberately focused on the experience of school leavers going overseas, because it is with them that all the factors I have outlined come into play. School leavers doing voluntary work in this country will probably stay at home and do something in their own locality. However, I agree with the thrust of the hon. Gentleman's question.

[Mr. St. Aubyn]

The Government plan a programme involving millennium volunteers, and I believe that they hope for 100,000. Over the past six months, the Government have been asked many times—most recently in the House of Lords by Baroness Hooper—whether they will include overseas volunteers in the category of millennium volunteers. Millennium volunteers are contributing to their community, and overseas volunteers are contributing to the wider international community. I believe, as do the organisations involved, that overseas volunteers should also be allowed to wear the badge of the millennium volunteers, thus highlighting a very special opportunity for those involved.

I would not want to conclude without stressing the support that students receive for the gap year, not only from employers but from universities. I have here one of the many letters that I have received on the subject. The vice-chancellor of Loughborough university today wrote:

"we regard gap year experiences as very valuable not least in taking forward students' key skills in terms of informal learning from work, travel etc. This fits in very well with the Dearing recommendations on key skill development for all HE students."

I represent a university town—it contains the university of Surrey—and I know that my vice-chancellor supports the idea of well-structured gap year experiences.

A year ago, the Department for Education and Employment was barely aware of gap year students. We know that, because of the hiatus caused for gap year students when the Government's plans for tuition fees were first announced. On that occasion, the Government performed a U-turn which might have done credit to a certain football team last night. They certainly performed a valuable service in recognising that there needed to be an exception for those students, but several thousands were still caught by the change in policy. I think that the Department is now much more aware of the nature of the gap year experience, the wide range of school leavers who take part, and of the importance of answering this call for them to be given guidelines.

10.4 am

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): I thank the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) for raising this topic. I apologise to the House for the state of my voice, but a great deal of cheering and shouting went on last night. Having then to go into the radio studios at 11.15 pm to do a late-night phone-in was not the best of experiences, but no doubt the Minister is familiar with that, having had to respond to the drubbing that Wales took in the southern hemisphere recently, on which the whole world commiserates with him.

The gap year experience is a very important subject. The one thing we learned from last summer's fiasco involving Government policy, or the lack of Government policy, on gap year students—the hon. Member for Guildford was generous in not spending too much time on it—is that there is a need to tighten the regulations, and to put the gap year on a much more secure footing.

I shall be brief, as I do not want to relive the nightmares of 1997; nor do I want to re-run in any detail the arguments about the introduction of tuition fees. At about midnight tonight, we shall have yet another vote, after a long debate on Scottish fees, and hon. Members will be able to make their feelings known. However, the Minister must still expect to respond to last summer's fiasco concerning the gap year, particularly the way in which it was handled.

It is now a matter of record that the Secretary of State's statement on 25 July gave the clear impression that there would be no leeway for gap year students going off in 1997, and deferring their higher education places until 1998. The Government then performed a number of U-turns, which we welcome, as did the hon. Member for Guildford. However, it was clear from what the Government did that they did not understand the nature of the gap year, and were not familiar with the reasons why students took a gap year, or what an integral part it is of the higher education system.

On 14 August, Baroness Blackstone issued the famous press release which made the Government's position clear. However, it was not until about 24 September that universities were given hard information on what the Government's policy was. By that time, students who had not got offers of a place and had not taken up gap placements by 1 August were left out in the cold.

The Government failed to recognise that many students do not make their gap year arrangements as early or precisely as some would like, but wait until their A-level results come out. Only then do they make their decisions. It is important that they have that leeway, and can make their decisions as late as possible. The higher education system should be flexible enough to enable them to do so.

When they made their decision last year, the Government gave no hint to potential gap year students that there would be any change in the regulations. Students who expected to wait until their A-level results came out before making a decision had no indication that there was to be a change. The Government made a retrospective decision, which was applied arbitrarily to the 1997 student cohort. That was wrong. The way in which it was communicated to students was absolutely deplorable. At every stage, it was revealed in the press—through a leak to The Times on 11 August and a press release by Baroness Blackstone on 14 August. Individuals or institutions were obliged to monitor the press in order to find out what was happening in respect of Government policy. In his response to the debate, will the Minister assure us that future policy changes will not be announced only in press releases, but that the data will be sent to the relevant organisations and institutions involved, so that the information is available to everyone at the same time?

My purpose in making that point is to draw attention to the fact that many students who had not decided to take a gap year by 1 August have been disadvantaged. That is an inequity that could be redressed, even at this late stage, if the Government extended to students who took a gap year but had not applied by 1 August the same facilities as were available to those who had applied earlier.

Many hon. Members will have received correspondence from parents, and from individuals who decided to take a gap year, who feel disadvantaged by the fact that they will go to university this year on different terms and conditions from those affecting students who had applied by 1 August. I know that the Minister, who is an honourable and decent man, will accept that the deadline of 1 August was an arbitrary decision. I should like to think that, even at this late stage, the Government will acknowledge that it was an arbitrary decision, and change their mind.

We are concerned about the future of the gap year, and the hon. Member for Guildford made some extremely interesting and detailed points about its extent and nature. However, he did not refer to the statement by Baroness Blackstone on 14 August:

> "The Government recognises the numerous advantages that taking a year out can bring. The Government is particularly keen to encourage volunteering and we will be examining ways of how we can encourage it in the future."

I may have missed something, but yesterday I searched the web pages of the Department for Education and Employment, and found absolutely no reference to any Government plans regarding gap years. The Minister may be able to give us a detailed résumé of the Government's plans. We would certainly like to see the noble Baroness's words put into action.

No doubt others will extol the virtues of students working as volunteers or travelling. Many are obliged to take a gap year in order to earn the money to enable them to go to university, either to pay their tuition fees or to help defray the costs. I am sure that the Minister and hon. Members accept that most students who take a gap year will not be going off to East Timor or Borneo, but working on building sites or doing manual work to earn enough money to pay their way through university; and that is honourable, too. I do not believe that there are two categories of gap year—one that is good for a certain type of student and one that should be regarded as less worthy.

The Government should recognise all students who take a gap year, irrespective of whether they work as volunteers or to raise the money to pay their way through university. One small concession that they could make is to allow students who take a gap year to have their fees paid at the level at which they would have entered higher education in the first place. It would not cost a great deal, but it would represent the Government's recognition that a gap year is important for students.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would be helpful if the Minister would mention the Government's plans for post-qualification entry, which will also affect the organisations involved, and explain how he proposes to involve the best of those organisations in his discussions on the introduction of post-qualification entry to universities?

Mr. Willis: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, which relates to the answer that I am trying to get from the Government in respect of the noble Baroness's statement. She made a powerful statement, and the Secretary of State has made similar ones. It is only right that the Minister is given an opportunity this morning to explain to the House what plans the Government have, so we look forward to his reply to the debate.

Finally, I strongly support the point that the hon. Member for Guildford made about guidelines and registration of organisations offering facilities to gap year students or any students who are taking time out. There is no doubt that the Louise Woodward case has highlighted some of the problems faced by young people who go abroad without being properly prepared, and the fact that there is no proper regulation or the necessary support mechanisms to help them. A register and clear Government guidelines would be welcomed by the organisations involved, but regulations certainly would not.

Mrs. Gorman: The hon. Gentleman has twice mentioned the Louise Woodward case. Surely that is a different issue, as she obtained employment through an employment agency, which is a different animal from the voluntary organisations to which my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) referred.

Mr. Willis: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her intervention, but I think that the two issues overlap. Many gap year students find work abroad or at home through employment agencies. More and more young people, particularly those travelling to the United States, Australia or the Pacific rim countries, are being encouraged to find work through employment agencies. Although I accept the hon. Lady's point that there is a difference between the two, it is important that the Government do not turn a blind eye, but seek the same guidelines for all relevant organisations, irrespective of whether they deal with undergraduates or others seeking work experience abroad.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Guildford for initiating this morning's debate, and look forward to the Minister's response.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I have listened with great interest to my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn), and congratulate him on raising an important subject that obviously has ramifications outside the orthodox type of gap year. In my constituency, students have expressed the hope that they will be able to take a gap year, and employers have told me how much they value that experience for students.

We have been told that, whereas in the past increasing numbers of students have taken a gap year, this year there has been a fall in the numbers. I put it to the Minister that that is not unconnected with the fact that the Government have now decided to raise the cost of higher education for better-off students, who will have to pay their tuition fees, and for less well-off ones, who will face higher accommodation and maintenance costs. As a result, as the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) pointed out, many more students will have to work in order to pay the expenses that the Government have increased for people in pursuit of higher education.

The Minister must accept that the Government's policies are having a detrimental effect on what we all agree has given a valuable dimension to many people's higher education experience. The majority of universities support the idea and go to great lengths to praise it, because the students who go to university after a gap year have more mature and focused views on why they are in higher education.

Many of us have had vast experience around the world as students and adults. We can all agree that there is no substitute for that contact with a variety of cultures and other people's way of life, as part of what would once have been called the university of life. That facility is undervalued. The Government's policies of increasing the cost of higher education are likely to deter many of our young people from gaining such experiences.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Does my hon. Friend agree that that highlights the Government's mistake in ignoring the recommendation of the Dearing report not to abolish the maintenance grant? The fact that they flew in the face of that recommendation is at the heart of the problems we are discussing.

Mrs. Gorman: I agree with my hon. Friend. We are discussing a very important issue. The gap year is not a frivolous extra in the pattern of education that has evolved in this country, but an integral and very important way to help those entering higher education to broaden their knowledge and develop a sympathetic view of the life style of what we choose to call ordinary working people and those overseas who are so much less fortunate than people in this country.

We sometimes take for granted the tremendous advantages of being a British citizen and having the opportunities of higher education offered by the taxpayer, which the previous Government, like all Conservative Governments, sought to expand. The proportion of young people going into higher education has risen from, I think, one in eight to one in three. That is a massive increase. It is important that those young, and to some extent privileged, people go out into the world and learn how the other half lives.

I urge the Minister not to neglect the damage that his party is doing by making higher education more expensive. Those who decide when they leave school that they cannot afford to go to university may be lost to higher education for ever. They may go off into the world of work and find that the cost of severing that connection to go back into higher education is too great. We can take credit for the fact that so many mature students joined our universities under Conservative Governments. Such students have already achieved what might be called gap years by having worked. They now realise the value of education, and have gone back for it.

I left school at 16 and went for what would now be called a gap year, although I did a Louise Woodward and got a job abroad, which was quite poorly paid, but was a wonderful experience—and one that I would not have had if there had been a minimum wage and the employers had had to pay me more than they thought I was worth. That experience was worth a great deal more than money. We should emphasise that point.

The Minister should not just encourage such schemes, but should review again the Government's detrimental move that has made it more difficult and more expensive for people on lower incomes to take those opportunities. There is a fine balance for people coming from what we call a working-class background between choosing higher education and going into work, which they may never come out of to return to higher education. Pushing people in one direction—I think that it is the wrong direction—is one of the many downsides of the Government's policy.

I hope that the Minister will take that criticism on board. It is meant to be constructive, and is based on my experience. I am sure that many other hon. Members have a similar background. Many of those who have come up the hard way to sit on the Labour Benches would, if they were here—I understand that they are busy elsewhere—undoubtedly support the idea of not just keeping but extending the possibilities of the gap year, and making it financially possible.

For all the grandiose talk about the value of such schemes, we shall not achieve an increase in the university of life year unless we make it financially viable. I hope that the Minister will give us a constructive answer, not a lot of political propaganda trumpeting Labour's changes to education. He should admit that there are downsides to his policies, which he should ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to review carefully.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) on securing this debate on such an important and topical subject. He should be given credit for the work he did in his gap year, which he described as having taken place a few years ago. As he and I were contemporaries at university, I have inside knowledge on how few those years are. It is probably better for both of us if I draw a veil over the number.

My hon. Friend made a powerful case based on his experience. Being a social worker in Soweto in those days would have been radically different from any experience that he had had before or has had since. It will have been important for his personal growth, and for those for whom he did useful work. It certainly sounds more useful than my gap year, which I spent as a journalist. I am not sure that that improved my social and moral growth, and it may not have been as useful for the community.

I also thank the other two hon. Members who have spoken. The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) gave a learned and thoughtful dissection of the chaos that fell on the Government when they made their tuition fees announcement last summer. My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) made a characteristically pungent and thoughtful contribution on the wider benefits of the gap year.

It is regrettable that more hon. Members did not feel impelled to join the debate. The last time that I looked, the parliamentary Labour party had five ex-presidents of the National Union of Students, and their specialist knowledge might have been useful. I can assume only that, like much of the rest of the country, they are spending the morning sticking pins into wax models of David Beckham. That will be my last reference to that national disaster.

We all agree on the importance of this subject. The gap year is important for students. It needs to become more important, but it is in danger of becoming less important for a variety of reasons relating to the attitude of young people and the Government's policies on student funding. It is widely agreed across political divides that promoting lifelong learning is one of the most important steps forward we can take to educate our people and provide a more competitive economy. However, we might be about to take a step backwards on this issue, in which the interaction of real life and academic life has been encouraged for many years. It seems perverse—just when, as a society, we are encouraging people beyond the traditional student age to go into education—to discourage people of the traditional student age from gaining experience in the real world.

The Minister will be aware that several extremely good organisations have for many years been trying to promote gap year activities. Indeed, one, which is neatly called GAP—the Gap Activities Project, an educational charity—has the Government's specific endorsement. Its most recent brochure contained a message from the Foreign Secretary, celebrating the project's 25th anniversary.

The best quotation in that brochure is from the chief executive of the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service, who makes the point that gap year activities benefit not only students and society as a whole but universities:

"most universities and colleges are now very much in favour of a constructive gap year"— one would emphasise "constructive"—

"some are even beginning to insist on it. GAP volunteers take on social responsibilities and learn the hard way to manage their lives. This means they bring a more mature and broader approach to their studies."

That is clearly true, as I am sure the Minister would agree. GAP is just one of the relevant organisations. My hon. Friend the Member for Guildford mentioned others, and I shall say a word about Voluntary Service Overseas in a minute.

The points made by GAP were emphasised by one of its trustees, Baroness Hooper, who told another place earlier this year that the organisation currently sends 1,300 young people overseas, and that, on her recent visit to the Falkland Islands, she found eight GAP students working in various ways on farms or in local museums. The organisation also brings volunteers from overseas to this country.

Baroness Hooper asked the Government for assurances on three points; I hope that the Minister will be able to assure us on them in this debate. She said that the Government need to encourage broader educational experience and young people should play a more active part in citizenship. All of us must have such an important general aim; we must not let young people drift away from their wider responsibilities.

Baroness Hooper's second point, which I hope the Minister will address, concerned post-qualification applications to university. That fits the wider theme of lifelong learning, about which I am sure the Minister will want to talk. Baroness Hooper suggested that the Government should move to a system of post-qualification applications that "would provide those in the GAP organisation"— and no doubt other organisations that promote such useful activity—

"with a clear means of communication to the Department for Education and Employment in terms of being able to provide information from their experience and being able to explain clearly their needs."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 4 March 1998; Vol. 586, c. 1264.]

Baroness Hooper's third issue—my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford also raised it—concerns the millennium volunteers initiative, which has been widely welcomed. It would be impossible to say that all millennium-related activities are uncontroversial. I am sure that the Minister is grateful that the one with which he has most contact—the millennium volunteers programme—is one of the least controversial ideas on the subject that the Government and others have come up with. I congratulate him on that. Nevertheless, I echo my hon. Friend's words, and hope that the Minister will clarify the status of overseas volunteers in the programme. That would clearly give the programme some imprimatur, some badge of approval, which would help to raise its profile and status.

That brings me to VSO, with which, I suppose, most people would associate gap year activities. VSO springs to mind most readily; everyone has heard of it, and everyone has some image of it, which might be wrong. As it is one of the pioneering organisations in its field, the news to which my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford alluded is rather disturbing. VSO has 2,000 volunteers working in 59 developing countries. This year, for the first time, it has seen a fall in the number of its recruits. I am sure that the Minister will have read, as I have, comment inspired by that fall and the possible reasons for it.

The first suggested reason is that many 15 to 25-year-olds simply have not heard of VSO. That is a problem for the organisation. The 10 per cent. drop in the number of volunteers that it will send abroad, which is reflected by a 22 per cent. fall in applications and a 50 per cent. fall in applications for teaching posts, deserves wider consideration. VSO identifies as a potential problem the fact that the word "volunteering" puts people off. As one representative of another voluntary organisation said,

"Volunteering doesn't have a cool image."

I am happy that, almost officially, the phrase "Cool Britannia" has been buried. It was always a terrible idea. By its very nature, something that is cool today is bound not to be cool tomorrow. Attempting to brand an entire country as cool was an extremely short-term and foolish idea. Behind the slightly flip phrase, however, lies a genuine problem. If it is not considered attractive to young people, the good work—concerning both the people involved and the projects—will suffer. This is one issue on which, for once, the Government's warm words would be useful. I hope that the Minister will consider that.

There appears to be a difference between the attitude of young people to volunteering overseas and to volunteering in this country. The number of volunteers who want to do community service in this country is still rising.

That gives the lie to the general point that has been made in much coverage of VSO's problems that we are entering a "me" generation, in which young people are much less altruistic. My experience is that that is simply untrue. I suspect that the level of altruism in young people does not shift very much from generation to generation. A certain number will be inclined to volunteer, and a certain number will not. The idea that the morality available in any cohort changes radically is slightly short-sighted.

Mrs. Gorman: My hon. Friend has raised an important point about altruism and participation in voluntary activity. Is not the Labour party's continual harping on the claim that unpaid or lowly paid work is invalid, and its insistence on minimum wages for people over the age of 19—an age at which we still expect people to volunteer—a factor in the changing attitude of young people? The issue is becoming political. Constant harping about slave wages and people being ground into the dust by wicked employers is undermining the spirit of altruism, which once encouraged young people voluntarily to give up their time.

Mr. Green: My hon. Friend tempts me on to the interesting subject of the interaction between voluntary work and the minimum wage, but, as time is short, I shall resist that temptation.

[Mr. Green]

The central question that the Minister must answer is whether the Government are taking action to encourage young people to take gap years and widen their experience. Considering objectively the Government's actions over the past 15 or 16 months since they came into office, they are not improving the situation; they are making it worse.

The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough pointed out last year's funding arrangements fiasco. We have to put that in the wider context of the Government having rejected the Dearing committee recommendations on the preservation of the maintenance grant, which has had a series of deleterious effects on student funding—one of which we shall debate this evening, with, I suspect, rather more hon. Members present on both sides. I shall not use this debate to rehearse my arguments on that subject.

The gap year problem is simply one of a range of problems into which the Government have stumbled because of their proposals for funding arrangements. I am sure that they regard it as a relatively minor problem, but they have sent an important signal about how they regard the gap year.

The lack of maintenance grants will, for many students, mean larger debts when they leave university. Those of us who are involved in the minutiae of that subject have argued about it at great length, and will continue to do so, but the one fact that students thinking about their time at university have grasped about the new funding arrangements is that many of them will leave with large debts. The net effect is that fewer will consider taking a gap year, and more of those who want to do so will feel impelled to take a paying job rather than do any low-paid or unpaid voluntary activity.

Far fewer students are likely to take gap years after they have finished their main university course, because they will have a large debt and the bank manager will be breathing down their neck. Perhaps most importantly, they will have noted the Government's attitude when it was discovered that the introduction of tuition fees would cause a specific problem for gap year students. As the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough has pointed out, weeks passed before the Government dealt with the problem, because, although it was a serious and immediate problem for those involved, the Government clearly did not regard it as such. They simply had not thought about guidance for gap year students in that case, or at all.

That sent gap year students the clear message: "Forget about the warm words, and the Foreign Secretary making nice comments in brochures for organisations that promote gap years. Look at our deeds. The Government do not care all that much about gap year students and the activities they promote." I hope that the Government have learnt from that lesson, and that the fiasco will not be repeated. I hope that the Minister can reassure us that the Government have changed their deeds, and words, on gap years.

Moving on to what I should like to hear from the Minister, the first action the Government could take is to change their message and take practical action, or gap years will become unfashionable. I am indebted to The Guardian—not a phrase one often bears at this Dispatch Box—for summing up many people's thoughts on gap years in an article last year. It said:

"The convention wisdom is that it's best to do something 'worthwhile', whether that's working in a shelter for homeless people or backpacking in the Punjab with nothing but a bottle of diarrhoea medicine and a Kula Shaker album for company."

That may well be the traditional, popular view of a gap year, but in this age, students who are thinking of taking a gap year will think that it is impractical, and will be put off. The first practical action the Government could take, for example, is to give us more information on the millennium volunteers.

Secondly, as my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford said, the Government could produce guidelines for gap courses that are available. I shall not ask for registration or detailed regulation—that would be inappropriate and wrong. However, the Government could issue guidelines so that students know that they are taking reliable, decent courses, and that they are not simply spending a year doing something life-enhancing while listening to Kula Shaker or anyone else. They would then know that they will benefit from their gap year activities, and so will other people.

Thirdly, the Government could collect some decent figures. My hon. Friend the Member for Guildford has pointed out that even the unparalleled resources of the House of Commons Library cannot find any accurate figures about the numbers of people taking gap year courses or what they are doing. I take it as read that, if the Library cannot find those figures, they do not exist. Clearly, policy would be better informed if there were decent figures. For example, do the Government have a target for numbers of students taking a gap year? If not, do they think that more students should take gap years? If so, what will they do about it?

The overall message is that the pressures on students are increasing, and it is possible that gap years will disappear altogether. That would be extremely damaging for the health of the education system, the personal growth of the students involved, and Britain's image around the world, where many gap year students have done much good over the past few decades. That would be a step back from the idea of lifelong learning, and I hope that the Minister will provide reassurance on all those points.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Dr. Kim Howells): I add my thanks to the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) for bringing this important subject to the attention of the House, and for his thoughtful speech.

On statistics, the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) knows that I too am very concerned about how we collect statistics in this country. We are not very good at it; we spend a lot of money on it, but do not get very good value. We prepared some calculations for the debate, which show that currently just over 19,000 students have been offered a deferred place. The hon. Member for Guildford mentioned between 20,000 and 30,000 students, and I suspect that he is not far off the correct figure. They are students who said that they were interested in taking a gap year or a year off.

Mr. St. Aubyn: One has to distinguish between those who had a gap year lined up by the time they left school and those who made a conscious decision to apply to university after they knew their A-level results. They are certainly in addition to the 19,000, and they are the several thousand students who, last year, sadly still suffered because of the way in which the Government dealt with the problem induced by their new rules on student funding.

Dr. Howells: I am sure that those statistics are not far wrong, and I would not argue with them. I hope that the hon. Gentleman appreciates my giving the figure of 19,000 so that he has a baseline from which to work, because I know that he is interested in pursuing the matter.

On volunteering, I was interested in what the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) said—I am always interested in what she says, although she has lost her radical edge these days. I used to love listening to her old philosophical stance, but I fear that it has mellowed somewhat.

Mr. Willis: Sweet reason, but not on Europe.

Dr. Howells: Yes, sweet reason.

Volunteering is not exclusive to would-be students. I know many volunteers who are in their 50s, 60s and 70s. We are all sure of the virtues of volunteering, and know that we must encourage it in every way, but we must pay tribute to everyone who volunteers. It is not only the student cohort, but many other people who volunteer—indeed, society depends on volunteering in many different ways.

As the hon. Member for Ashford said, VSO has been of enormous importance to the image of this country. In addition, it has touched many families: my brother was a VSO volunteer in New Guinea, although he did not have a Kula Shaker album with him, and his anti-diarrhoea medicine did not do much good; after spending about four years abroad, he returned to this country with some awful bacterial disease.

As the hon. Member for Billericay says, guidelines and safety are key issues. The Government recognise the advantages to society and to individuals of young people undertaking enriching activities such as voluntary work, cultural exchanges, educational visits and work experience. We are keen to encourage volunteering by students, especially before they take up courses in higher education, if that is what they intend to do.

Our manifesto commitment to develop proposals for a national programme of citizen's service for young people is being fulfilled through the millennium volunteers programme. That programme's aim is to support young people between the ages of 16 and 25, and encourage them to make a sustained commitment to volunteering in a way that benefits the community; £15 million has been made available for the programme in this country. Decisions on the availability of future funding for millennium volunteers will be taken after this month's announcement of the outcome of the comprehensive spending review.

A consultation document was issued last October. We received 500 responses to the separate consultation exercises in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. There was strong support for millennium volunteers, and widespread recognition of the fact that volunteering helps young people to develop as responsible citizens. We have made the criteria for the programme as flexible as possible, without losing the requirement of a sustained personal commitment from the young person, which is the key to making millennium volunteers distinctive.

We recognise that the investment of time alone is not a measure of quality—that point lay at the heart of the speech of the hon. Member for Guildford. We have developed the idea, proposed in our consultation exercise, of a volunteer plan, which sets out the voluntary activity and the learning opportunities for the young person. I was glad that the hon. Gentleman emphasised the importance of having such a plan, and of knowing that quality training will be offered and that the experience will be of value; and that the young person will not be exploited to enrich the sponsoring organisation, or, in a more barefaced way, used as cheap labour.

National delivery of the programme will not be carried out by the Government; instead, a new organisation will be set up in England to deliver millennium volunteers. We are currently advertising in the national and voluntary press for the chairperson of that organisation. On 24 June, voluntary sector partners hosted a national conference to discuss the implementation of the programme in England, and to publish the document "Setting the Framework". Several demonstration projects in England are being set up over the next few weeks, and the Department intends to publish a millennium volunteers guide, which invites organisations to apply for funding, after the summer.

The consultation document expressed explicitly an expectation that activities undertaken by participants should "offer the prospect of value to the wider community".

We are not yet convinced that volunteering overseas can achieve that result on its own. We have to widen the consultation to take into account some of the arguments that have been advanced, not least by the hon. Member for Guildford today.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Will the Minister consider the suggestion that, if he is going to draw on 100,000 volunteers without endorsing the concept of overseas volunteering, he might draw into his programme those who would derive greater benefit from overseas projects and jeopardise the viability of some of the valuable projects that they would otherwise have undertaken?

Dr. Howells: I could not agree more, and I shall certainly take that important point into consideration. I am determined to ensure that we do not jeopardise organisations that plan properly and offer volunteers who go overseas real training, valuable experience and education.

We are fully aware of the valuable work done by volunteers working abroad. I agree entirely that voluntary work overseas offers young people opportunities for personal development. I can give the hon. Gentleman the undertaking that the Government are sympathetic to the idea of encouraging volunteering overseas, and that we are considering how that might be recognised within the millennium volunteers programme. My officials recently met key organisations involved in volunteering overseas, and agreed to consult them further. A final decision on recognising volunteering overseas as part of the millennium volunteers initiative will be made when the consultation process is complete.

Voluntary work can be challenging for the individual concerned—that is part of the reward—but I accept that working overseas has its own particular challenges and difficulties. I have therefore listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's comments about the activities of certain organisations, and I hope that, at some stage, he will see fit to name those organisations, either in the House or outside. I was shocked by some of the figures he quoted—everyone should be concerned about the examples he gave of eight staff arranging 800 placements a year, each costing £2,000, with inadequate guarantees about the conditions awaiting the volunteers; and of the 70 organisations offering gap year experience entirely unregulated.

The hon. Member for Ashford will be relieved to hear that we do not believe that the Government should act as big brother, and try to regulate every single activity. That would impose a straitjacket in an area in which organisations need to be flexible in providing volunteering opportunities. The way forward lies in a voluntary code of self-regulation for organisations involved in arranging gap year projects, but that has to be a genuine exercise in drawing up a code that has some teeth and that can be effective when organisations step out of line. I am conscious of the fact that, occasionally, gap year arrangements do not work smoothly, so organisations need to ensure that adequate controls are in place.

Most students who take a year off have a rewarding experience. As the hon. Member for Guildford made clear, Guildford and many other universities and institutions of higher education appreciate the beneficial effects of the gap year.

There is now a Central Bureau for Educational Visits and Exchanges, which receives a grant of £5 million. It facilitates gap year placements and produces an advice booklet that covers health and safety issues. I give an undertaking that the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that departmental guidelines should be issued will be given careful consideration, especially in relation to our deliberations on extending the millennium volunteers programme to overseas placements. I shall ask the appropriate officials from my Department to meet the main voluntary organisations to discuss the question of guidelines.

Therefore, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that we have achieved some progress. I cannot give him a parallel or simile for last night's match, as he wanted. I am afraid that, as a rugby fan, I have not yet got over the 96:13 defeat of some of my constituents by South Africa. I hope that he will take that as an answer.

National Health Service (50th Anniversary)

10.59 am

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): Some anniversaries, like birthdays, are best forgotten, but others cry out for recognition because of their relevance to present-day society. Fifty years on, the national health service is one such example. As a Labour Member of Parliament and one who has the privilege of representing a constituency that in many ways gave birth to that service, I believe that that legislation was the finest piece of socialist legislation this century and created the jewel in our crown. We should never forget that the service was created when we had just gone through another world war and this country was just about bankrupt.

There is a certain irony here in that, 50 years on, we are still not only debating what form the national health service should take but, in the rich country that we are today, whether we can afford the sort of service that my predecessor Nye Bevan envisaged. When he spoke on Second Reading of the National Health Service Bill on 30 April 1946, he outlined his vision of a health service, saying:

"it will lift the shadow from millions of homes. It will keep very many people alive who might otherwise be dead. It will relieve suffering. It will produce higher standards for the medical profession. It will be a great contribution towards the wellbeing of the common people in Great Britain."—[Official Report, 30 April 1946; Vol. 422, c. 63.]

As we were reminded, it was to be a national health service in which the rich and the poor were to be treated alike, where poverty was not a disadvantage and wealth not an advantage.

I was reminded of that many years ago when Professor Richard Titmus recalled a visit to a London hospital for the treatment of cancer. He was being treated at the same time and the same place by the same doctor for the very same reason as a young West Indian lad. Titmus observed that what determined who would be treated first each day had everything to do with the vagaries of London's traffic and nothing to do with the amount of money that they had in their pockets.

How different that philosophy and that of the early pioneers of the NHS is from what happened during those awful 18 years of Tory government. We all remember the then Prime Minister, now Baroness Thatcher, proclaiming to the world that the national health service when in reality she was transforming the service to one that someone described as geared to meet the young, the rich and the healthy, ignoring the poor, the old and the chronically sick.

Obviously, I am pleased that the Government are making considerable efforts to reverse that trend and rectify those wrongs. Additional investment in the service is one of the many ways in which they are doing so. However, Nye also recognised that good health did not depend merely on the health service. He was the first to draw comparisons and to state that, to have good health, one also needed a good standard of living—therefore, if one wanted to tackle bad health, one had to tackle poverty. That was also recognised many years later with the publication of the Black report, which explained

"inequality in health can only be understood in relation to poverty and poor working conditions."

That is still obvious in my constituency, the birthplace of the national health service, which unfortunately is either at or near the top of the league tables for heart and respiratory diseases, cancers, mental health problems, long-term sickness, disabilities and rates of infant mortality, standardised mortality and low birth weight babies. No one will be surprised, if one accepts the link between poverty and bad health, that my constituency is in one of the poorest local authority areas in Wales. We have the highest unemployment in Wales and some of the lowest income levels in the United Kingdom. We also have inadequate housing. If all those and many other factors are brought together, one gets the sort of deprivation that we experience every day.

Neither this debate nor the 50th anniversary celebrations should be an exercise in nostalgia. I suspect that Nye would treat such an exercise with disdain and that he would want us to learn from those 50 years how we can build on his achievements and those of others. Nye would also be honest enough to see the need to point out where successive Governments have been going and are going wrong in their attempts to tackle bad health.

Once again, I shall give an example from my local authority, which is one of the smallest and poorest in Wales. In the past three years, successive Governments with their cuts have made the local authority make resulting cuts of approximately £14 million. One cannot have such cuts in a poor local authority area without adversely affecting the service provided and the health and standard of living of people in the community.

Local authorities like mine also lose out in other ways. For example, many of our health clinics have poor resources and many of the valley constituencies, including mine, also lose out because they find it difficult to attract doctors to set up practices. In my constituency, that situation has been exacerbated by the actions of the local area health authority. For example, a doctor retired in Cwm, Ebbw Vale, which has serious health problems, as do other parts of the constituency. Instead of the health authority replacing that doctor with another, it decided to transfer his work load to another local general practitioner. Obviously, that was not good enough and did not respond effectively to the problems of our community. Much to their credit, the local people raised their voices in protest and, as a result, the health authority was forced to reverse its plans. It then promised us another full-time permanent doctor, but we are still awaiting the replacement a number of years later and we still have only a part-time, temporary doctor.

The Government are not only aware of the link between bad health and deprivation, but are trying to do something about it and, for me, the most important legislation during this Parliament must be the introduction of a minimum wage. However, the effectiveness of such a wage in combating poverty will obviously depend on the level at which it is set. I accept the arguments put forward by many individuals and trade unions, including those representing health service workers, that, if the wage is to be effective, it should be set at £4.60 per hour.

My next question concerns the possible privatisation of the health service. Successive Governments have proposed or enacted legislation to privatise different public services. Indeed, they seemed to want to copy the United States of America, for example, and how it runs such services.

Many years ago, I read a book on health care in the United States, which mentioned that the chair of Kentucky Fried Chicken had decided to resign his position to head the new Hospital Corporation of America because, as he said:

"The growth potential in hospitals is unlimited. It's even better than Kentucky Fried Chicken."

I do not know how many hon. Members have tasted Kentucky Fried Chicken but, if they have, they will be justifiably concerned that the quality of the product will be what we could expect if the health service is privatised. To allow such an organisation to be involved in the health service would be as nonsensical as to allow McDonald's, for example, to be involved in the organisation of education zones.

I know that the usual response to those who warn about the privatisation of the health service is to say that it will never happen, but the reality is different—one has only to think of the private finance initiative, for example. It is good to see the Secretary of State for Wales here today. He was sponsored for many years by the National Union of Public Employees, and then by Unison, as it became. Unison described the PFI as creeping privatisation, and I agree with that sentiment. It referred to Labour's announcement of major acute hospital PFI schemes, and reminded us that

"PFI in the NHS is not simply about bricks and mortar. It is about the ownership and control of NHS assets, services and staff . . . Private consortia will finance, build, own and run new hospitals or services and lease them back to the NHS . . . PFI is also beginning to dominate other forms of investment and service delivery in the NHS. For example, the lack of public investor finance for sterile supplies or NHS catering facilities is resulting in PFI being used extensively in this area also."

Responsibility for running services is being handed to the private sector in return for private finance. That, as Unison argues, is creeping privatisation, which will, in the long term, be very expensive for the NHS.

If Government spokespersons are not willing to accept the opinions of so great a union as Unison, I am sure that they will want seriously to consider the words of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, whom we all respect. In 1996, as a shadow health spokesperson, she said to a Unison conference:

"When the private sector is building, owning, managing and running a hospital, it has indeed been privatised."

I agree with what she said then, just as I agree with Unison now.

If Nye had wanted a health service to be provided by private companies, he would not have created the national health service. He inherited a patchwork of voluntary, local authority and private hospitals, from which he created a national health service free at the point of use—a service for people, not for profit. If he had wanted a national health insurance system, he would have created one. Nye believed that it was vital that the NHS should be provided by the public sector—the PFI undermines that vision.

As we celebrate the 50th anniversary of the foundation of the NHS, the Welsh Office has published a consultative document proposing a trust to cover the whole of Gwent.

[Mr. Llew Smith]

I believe that that will damage the service in the northern part of Gwent. I want Gwent to have two trusts, but that is not my opinion alone—it is also the opinion of the Blaenau Gwent borough council, Monmouthshire county council, the community councils in the area, the Nevill Hall trust, the community health councils in north Gwent, many voluntary organisations and thousands of people who have signed a petition.

If the Minister is unwilling to listen to those bodies, perhaps he will listen to the 166 general practitioners who have gone public in their opposition to the Welsh Office's one-trust proposal. When I raised the issue some months back, only 50 GPs opposed the proposal; now, 166 GPs oppose it, and that number is increasing every day. Those people should not be ignored. I know that the Welsh Office will say that Gwent health authority supports the scheme, but, in fact, the health authority expressed only a marginal preference for that option. All the main players—for want of better description—have come out in opposition to the Welsh Office proposal.

I am aware that one of the reasons why the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths), opposes the two-trust option for Gwent is that he does not want to break up local authority areas. However, in giving trust status to Cynon Valley and Merthyr as part of the North Glamorgan trust, he accepted the need to break up the Rhondda Cynon Taff local authority area. We in my constituency do not object to that proposal—indeed, we applaud the Minister's wisdom—but we argue that he should apply the same reasoning to our community. He may argue that Cynon Valley and Merthyr already had their own trust, but that does not detract from the fact that he is willing to break up local authority areas.

It is proposed that there will be 15 trusts in Wales to serve 2.9 million people—each trust will, on average, serve just under 200,000 people. However, a single trust for Gwent would cover some 550,000 people, although even that is a considerable underestimate, as it does not take into account the catchment areas in Powys and, indeed, parts of Herefordshire.

On 30 March, my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend perceptively conceded that the trust, if approved, would be very large. In the consultation document, he said:

"With a project turnover of £240 million in 1999–2000 and fixed assets of £180 million, the trust would be one of the largest in the UK."

He could also have said that it would employ a massive bureaucracy of 10,000 people and that it would probably cover an area of some 300 square miles. He seemed to be of the opinion that, for Gwent, big is beautiful. However, for some reason, he decided to reject that philosophy for his constituency. Indeed, the trust that he has set up to cover his constituency and the two neighbouring constituencies will serve a population of only 270,000. I wonder why that is. If we accept the logic of the view that big is beautiful—that trusts to serve 550,000 people are acceptable—Swansea should be added to the trust that will cover those three constituencies, as such a trust would be similar in size to the one that is proposed for Gwent. We in my area and in the area of my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Edwards) do not argue that the trust serving Bridgend, Port Talbot and Neath should be merged with the one serving Swansea. All we are saying is that that is the logic of the Minister's position.

We want a trust in north Gwent that can concentrate on the health problems that I have outlined. We do not want a single trust covering the whole of Gwent, under which we would be lost, as we have been lost in the past. The present health funding formula does not take into account the number of people who need long-term care, so areas such as Blaenau Gwent are discriminated against because of their poverty and serious health problems. That is hardly a socialist principle, but it is the reality.

To deal with the winter bed crisis, north Gwent received only 22.5p per patient, whereas the south of the county received £3.47. A year or two ago, it was decided that the provisions for mental health in Gwent should be reorganised. The person appointed to carry that out admitted at a public meeting that he knew nothing about the area. He did not bother to consult the patients, their families and friends, nurses, doctors, local authorities, community councils, trade unions, Members of Parliament or the community health council. That is how we in Gwent have been treated, and we do not want history to repeat itself.

The Minister says that there will be a phased replacement of existing technology and information systems. How long will that take and what will it cost? He says that the existing management responsibilities will be retained until April 1999 and that key responsibilities will be identified as soon as possible. Tell that to a demoralised staff, who are facing yet another major upheaval.

The Minister tells us that locally delivered services will continue to be provided in north Gwent, but he does not say whether they will be the existing services or whether they will be enhanced or reduced. Of course local services will be provided locally: they would not be local services otherwise. What guarantee do my constituents have that they will not have to travel 30 miles to a hospital for treatment or to visit friends or family?

I warn my colleagues in other parts of Gwent that, if high-quality clinical and surgical services are transferred to south Gwent, day-to-day routine operations could be transferred to the north. That would not only affect morale and recruitment in the north but would mean that patients and visitors from Newport would have to travel to Abergavenny.

There are no real health arguments for the one-trust option, and even the possible savings seem to have been watered down. The Government's penny-pinching attitude does them no credit in a country that is now so rich and that was so desperately poor when the national health service was created 50 years ago.

We are told that this is a consultation exercise. We hope that it is; if it is, the Minister will find out that virtually all the community is opposed to the proposals. If it is consultation, and not merely another public relations stunt, the Minister will have the courage to alter the proposals from one trust for Gwent to two. If he fails to do that, we shall all know that it was consultation in name only, and our communities will lose out once again.

We hope that the legacy of the Government will not be one of damaging the national health service that Nye and others had the imagination and courage to create. Future generations would not forgive us for that. Let us build on the positive aspects of the Government's work in the national health service and ensure that, this time at least, justice is done for the people in our communities.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith), who represents a constituency that, as he said, was once represented by the right hon. Gentleman who is associated with the founding of the national health service, the 50th anniversary of which we are celebrating.

Let me say en passant that I understand the philosophy behind the primary care groups, but we do not contemplate anything in my part of England that would be as large as the hon. Gentleman suggested for his part of Wales. The group that has been proposed for my health authority would involve 50-odd general practitioners and cover a population of 80,000.

I know a little about the medical profession, and I find that GPs have their own way of doing things: they and other members of the medical profession rightly have an independence of attitude towards the way in which they carry out their duties and ply their skills. There are those in rural practices who have developed particular attitudes to fit the needs of their patients, and if we amalgamate all those people with their different priorities, combining urban and rural areas, I fancy that it will not always be easy to find the harmony that one would expect among professional people carrying out their duties on behalf of the public.

I do not want to go into great detail, because I want to cover a wider canvas on the question of the national health service, but I want to fire a warning shot across the Minister's bows—I welcome his presence, because I know that he takes a keen and practical interest in these matters—to show that I hope to get an assurance, at some future date, that my worst fears are not well founded.

It is an honour to speak in this debate and to pay tribute to the national health service and to all those who work or have worked in it, giving of their time, skill and dedication—bywords among many of us who have had the opportunity to meet at their work those who have given such excellent service to the public.

I was almost in at the birth of the national health service, as I am one of the few Members of Parliament who was alive and well at the time of its introduction. Little did I know that, some years later, I would represent the constituency now represented by the Secretary of State for Health—Holborn and St. Pancras, South, as it then was—which contains some of the finest teaching hospitals in the world. I got to know members of the medical profession, nursing staff and administrators extremely well. I pay a warm tribute to them, as they carry on the best traditions of medicine to be found anywhere on the globe.

I also compliment those who give service in my health authority area—they are dedicated, as one would expect, and try to observe the highest standards, although it is not always easy for them so to do—and especially those who give of their time and money to help out the smaller hospitals.

We are fortunate enough to have two community hospitals. It took two deputations to persuade the previous Government not to close the community hospital at Crowborough, which, like so many in the 19th century, was founded by voluntary contributions. Today, it is still charged with raising £2 million—it has raised £1 million—to ensure, with help from the health authority, that it can be modernised and fulfil the important function of allowing elderly people and women with babies not to have to travel to the district general hospital in a congested town far away. I pay an especially warm tribute to the voluntary side, which has spent so much time trying to raise money, with some success, although there is still a long way to go.

I also congratulate the previous Government, whom I have heard rubbished on more than one occasion, including at yesterday's Question Time. It is now part of the ritual to say, "No, we spent more than you did," "No, you didn't, you spent less," "You destroyed what we tried to build up," and so on. All new Governments say such things. The previous Government did the same after the cuts in the health service imposed by the previous Labour Government during the stormy economic days of 1976 to 1979.

I wish to goodness that we could get rid of some of the ridiculous party politics. One reason why the national health service is failing us—not in terms of health, but in terms of its structure—is that the concept of it leads to too much low-grade politicking. I try to avoid that, but I do not think that it was pointed out yesterday that, overall, we increased expenditure on the health service by 3 per cent. in real terms. Of course, the amount varied from one year to another; we would have liked a smoother financial passage.

When the last Conservative Government came to office in 1979, expenditure on the NHS in England, as opposed to the United Kingdom as a whole, was some £9 billion. When we left office, it was well over £35 billion—and that was not small beer. We spent more, standards improved, and so it went on. I do not think that that record should be rubbished.

Nor should our record be rubbished in respect of the birth of the national health service. It is true that Conservative Members of Parliament opposed it, but so did doctors. It should not be assumed that a politician who opposes the NHS does not care for the people, any more than doctors who opposed it should be accused of not caring for the people. What they did not like was state control over health matters, which they saw as socialism.

Even Lord Beveridge, the architect of the modern welfare state, was not keen on the creation of a national health service. He had certain things to say about it. They may sound rather old-fashioned now, but I think that they are worth repeating. He said:

"It is a logical corollary to the receipt of high benefits in disability that the individual should recognise the duty to be well and to co-operate in all steps which may lead to diagnosis of disease in early stages when it can be prevented. Disease and accidents must be paid for in any case . . . One of the reasons why it is preferable to pay for disease and accidents openly and directly in the form of insurance benefits, rather than indirectly, is that this emphasises the cost and should give a stimulus to prevention."

That is, perhaps, a rather Victorian concept.

Beveridge went on to say:

"British people are clearly ready and able to pay contributions for institutional treatment. Should a payment for this purpose be included in the compulsory insurance contribution and be passed on as a grant from the Social Insurance Fund to the health departments towards the maintenance of the institutions?"

He referred to

"the importance of securing that suitable hospital treatment is available for every citizen and that recourse to it, at the earliest moment when it becomes desirable, is not delayed by any financial considerations. From this point of view, previous contribution"—

[Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith]

through the insurance system, I assume—

"is . . . better even than the free service supported by the tax-payer. People will take what they have already paid for without delay when they need it, and they pay for it more directly as contributors than as tax-payers."

It is possible that, because it is free at the point of demand, the NHS has weakened that link—weakened the citizen's feeling that he should take responsibility for his own health, and his awareness of the connection between his treatment and the cost to the nation, as well as to his family. That point is ripe for debate, because it cuts right across the concept of the service being free at the point of demand. I am merely quoting the views of someone who was not cruel or hard-hearted, and who recognised the importance of health treatment to the poorer members of the community, but who thought that there was another way—perhaps a more responsible way—of ensuring that there was a link between the insurance taken out by a citizen and the service that he received as a consequence.

The hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent spoke of Aneurin Bevan's dedication to the health service. Bevan, however, realised that he was opening the floodgates. He referred to the cascade of medicine that would flow down the throats of the British people. Even at that time, he was aware of the mounting costs of the health service. Although he did not want to, Bevan—and the House of Commons—had to accept that prescription charges would have to be introduced. Then came the question of paying for spectacles, and so on.

Bevan was clearly disappointed, because he resigned, but he understood what had happened. He is on record as saying that costs were increasing at an alarming rate—more than he had ever imagined.

Mr. Llew Smith: If the right hon. Gentleman reads Nye Bevan's resignation speech, he will see that Bevan resigned not just over prescription charges, but over such issues as defence spending. He thought that one area of spending was causing problems to another. It is interesting to read that speech.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I am sure it is, but I do not think it can be denied that Bevan realised that the floodgates had been opened to heavy expenditure that he had not envisaged. I lived through it, and I know that, at the time, many people said that the health of the nation would improve and that costs would therefore fall. How wrong they were. I cannot criticise them, because that was the received wisdom at the time; but they did not realise that the health service was not the only vehicle for improving the health of the nation. Health can be improved by a better standard of living—by a better diet, better housing and better education. The health of the nation does not improve markedly more than that of any other nation because we have a national health service.

Although I admire what has been done and what is still being done, I think that we must face up to the reality of the NHS and what it has achieved. We should not just look back; we need to look forward, and ask ourselves how we can provide a better and more affordable health service. The present system is not good enough, for many reasons. It can be improved.

Since 1948, most countries have looked at their own health services. Germany, for instance, has continued with a system that was introduced years ago by Bismarck. Its system of compulsory insurance for health treatment must have influenced Beveridge; otherwise, he would not have made the comments that I quoted. New Zealand, Canada and Holland have looked at their health services in recent years, and have introduced reforms on the principle to which most of us adhere: that the door should not be closed to people who happen to be poor. Such people should not be deprived of decent medical care.

Interestingly, not one country that has examined our system has adopted it. That should make us, on this 50th anniversary, take stock of the present situation, and ask ourselves what we can do to improve our service in the face of rising costs—costs that I cannot see declining, for several reasons.

First, the health service is labour intensive. As the Minister knows, a fair proportion of low-paid people work for the NHS. One reason why they put up with low pay is their feeling that they are doing something for others: that voluntary spirit is very strong in the health service. Those workers are better paid than many others, but, given the range of skills that they possess, and the salaries that such skills would command in other walks of life, they are not overpaid, by a long chalk. If we want to improve recruitment and reduce the notorious wastage in the NHS—especially among nurses—we must consider that point.

Secondly, there is the problem of the aging population, but I shall not dwell on that. Then there are the sensational advances in medical care and diagnostic technology. We all know how expensive that technology is. Someone was telling me the other day—I do not know whether it is true—that a little drip feed that could once be bought for very little now costs £140. Why is it so expensive? It is computerised, so doctors do not need to attend to it. They know what is going into the patient, and whether the mixture is right. That is a great advance, but it is expensive.

Expectations are always rising. I will never forget being absolutely astonished to meet a woman who I thought had gone into hospital, but who was back and walking after her hip operation. It is not uncommon to meet people who have had two hip operations. Expectations are rising because people know that a wide range of surgical techniques hitherto undreamt of—and certainly unthought of by the medical profession at the foundation of the health service—are now available, and might improve the quality of their lives.

Dr. Chris Adams, a consultant to the department of neurosurgery at the Radcliffe infirmary, Oxford, is not regarded as a wild, radical doctor who runs ahead of the pack. In the November edition of Parliamentary Review, whose editorial judgment would, one assumes, lead it to employ only those whom it believes to be reasonably rational, Dr. Adams said:

"Financing medical care is a world problem."

However, we need not feel guilty about that,

"Because each year advances make medicine more expensive—and that trend will accelerate. This country cannot afford a comprehensive free health service, and it is not providing one."

He went on to say, as others do, that we should not put up with the present system of rationing. It is, of course, not always called "rationing", but there are long waiting lists for certain treatments for which there is great demand. If one believes that the health service should be free at the point of demand, one might argue that that is immoral.

I do not want to generate party political heat, so I recognise that the Government do not accept that gloomy prognosis. The White Paper takes a different view, saying that, at its best, the NHS is the envy of the world. I do not use the word "envy"; I have seen too often how other countries employ the best techniques. I do not envy them that; they are pretty good, and we are pretty good, too, and have institutions and practices that are as good as any. However, as the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent said, we are a rich country, so that might be expected.

The White Paper also says that the Government reject arguments that the NHS cannot cope with the pressure of public expenditure without a huge increase in taxation or charges for services or radical restriction in patient care. It states:

"The health service is a strong and resilient organisation."

It also says that the NHS has met past challenges and will rise to future ones. It is not my purpose to say dogmatically that the Government are wrong, but hon. Members may have gathered that I have my doubts. They are not irrational doubts, and they are not motivated by emotion, but I have practical doubts about whether the Government's worthy aims can be met.

Funding the NHS by taxation always involves the menacing figure of the Chancellor. Chancellors are not cold-blooded men; even the present one has decent feelings, just as his predecessors did. However, Chancellors have a duty to the nation. They must consider defence, and there may be arguments about why defence should have more money. The hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent mentioned that Nye Bevan was concerned not only about the increasing costs of the health service and charges, but about the cost of defence. Chancellors are always concerned about rising costs. There are always battles between one Department and another.

Perhaps that is one reason why we are more politically conscious of the health service than virtually every country that I have visited. The politics of health in the United Kingdom stem largely from the fact that so much decision making lies here because we—rather, Chancellors—control the purse. The Chancellor has more control over decisions balancing how much should go to defence or other parts of public expenditure than any other Minister. Although the economy does not have to go from boom to bust, we all know that no economy can sail along year after year in the assumption that things will get better and better. There may be a world economic crisis from which we cannot be insulated, especially now that there is a global economy. That would have a profound effect on the Government's ability to deliver from taxation all the services that they want. That is one reason why people think it would be a good idea if the Government were to consider additional ways to finance health.

The Government should not underestimate the serious defects of the NHS. First, there is the money problem. In a few days, the Government will announce an extra injection of money, and I have read that it will be a greater real-terms per annum increase than has been accomplished before. I do not know if that is so, but there will be a substantial increase. All will look good for three years, but the Government cannot guarantee that there will not be some change in the economy that will leave the Chancellor having to tell a Secretary of State for Health that the belt has to be tightened. One of the service's problems is that it is wholly dependent on money from taxation.

There is an acute shortage of personnel—a particularly serious problem among nurses, doctors and specialists. One reason why there is a waiting list is that there are appallingly few consultants. According to 1994 figures, not very out of date, and still true, we have 9.5 consultants per 10,000 of the population. Sweden has 20 consultants, Germany 19, France 14, Finland 15 and the Czech Republic 20. We are not quite as badly off for general practitioners, but France has 14 per 10,000 of the population, while Great Britain has six. Germany has 11, and I could list other countries. The simple message is that the people on whom we rely for skilled advice and knowledge are in short supply. The NHS executive has also mentioned that we are short of modern equipment. We simply do not have enough of it. I visited the United States recently, and found that magnetic resonance imaging was everywhere. Here, we have made a start, but there is much to do.

I should like the Minister to pay attention to training—a difficult problem. The training of our medical profession is too unstructured and is inefficient. What happened at Bristol would not have happened if training and qualifications had been more specific. Junior doctors spend hours walking round wards looking after patients, but those hours are out of all proportion to the time when they should be provided with specific teaching. Our emphasis on teaching is not high enough. Of course, more teaching will not come cheap.

It is difficult to understand why the Government refuse to consider topping up revenues for the NHS, as happens in the European Union. Stephen Pollard, a former director of the Fabian Society, has said:

"Continental Socialists find little time for the politics of narrow-minded statism which has in recent decades characterised the British Labour movement's approach to healthcare. In countries such as France, Spain, Belgium and Greece, they really accept the complementary benefits that can be derived from actively involving their independent healthcare sectors and putting them to good use."

The socialist Government in France have no problem about topping up their taxpayers' contribution in that way. Other international comparisons also show the use of additional sums from, for example, non-profit mutual societies—an old Labour concept—and friendly societies. I cannot think why we do not make better use of them. For those reasons, the time has come for us, and especially the Government, to examine the matter and perhaps to go back to some of their old Labour roots to find how much we can better use our resources to ensure that the NHS is better funded and well funded.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I remind the House that this is a brief debate. Many hon. Members wish to speak. If they are brief, many will get in; but if they are not, many will be disappointed.

11.50 am

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) on securing his sixth Adjournment debate in this Parliament. He almost holds the record, but two Members have had seven. I have several points which, unfortunately, cannot be made in a couple of minutes. I want to draw attention to what I believe are the NHS's major weaknesses.

[Mr. Paul Flynn]

Like the right hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith), I remember the start of the health service. As a 13-year-old schoolboy at a May day rally in Sophia gardens in Cardiff, I heard Aneurin Bevan speak about the NHS. I remember it more vividly than, say, the events of yesterday evening, which is probably just as well. He used as a measure of the success of the health service something that strikes us as astonishing today—the increase in the birth rate. He pointed out that he was not claiming any personal responsibility for the increase. How extraordinarily things have changed. He would have been surprised that we rate the NHS by the crude measures of waiting lists and the amount of money spent.

I am sometimes critical of the Government, but we are doing splendid work on the NHS. I congratulate Ministers on tackling the major weaknesses. People will look back in 50 years and say that this was a turning point in the reform of the health service. I refer to the Government challenging the omnipotence of clinicians, which led in part to the terrible Bristol tragedies. So much of medicine is based on mythology, on the first thing that comes into a doctor's head, not on science or evidence. A series of individuals make thousands of decisions in their domains. Hip operations—on which I had a debate many years ago—are an example on which research and evidence exist.

The main weakness of the health service is not private medicine but the commercialisation of all medicine, with so much being done not for the needs of the patients or to advance medical science but to serve the interests of commercial companies. It was true even five years ago that anyone having treatment for cancer would have had as good treatment in the health service as they would have had privately. That is no longer true. It is now a gamble. People's treatment depends on where they live and whether drug companies are conducting trials in the area. The drug companies are leading research into cancer treatment. The whole business is a sad gamble with people's lives, because it is commercially driven.

Enormous damage is done by the vast over-use of medicinal drugs. It is a great tragedy and lives are being lost. We make a great fuss about illegal drugs, but the figures for Wales over the past four years show that six people died from heroin and only 13 from all illegal drugs, while 108 died from paracetamol, 28 from co-proxamol and 55 from methadone, which is a legal drug. In the UK, 2,500 people die annually from the misuse of medicinal drugs.

To see zombies with damaged lives who exist in a perpetual trance, one should go not to some slum to find kids with needles sticking out of them but to the residential homes. There, people are drugged unnecessarily with neuroleptic drugs. There have been two major reports in Britain on the subject. One was in a northern town, but I cannot say where because the report has not been published. It discovered that 54 per cent. of residents of such homes who were on neuroleptic drugs did not need them; 20 per cent. of admissions to hospital for elderly people resulted from misuse of medicinal drugs. That involved not only neuroleptic drugs but the interactions between all drugs. An identical figure was found at Gloucester royal hospital: 20 per cent. of elderly admissions were for misuse of such drugs. A Glasgow study showed that the figure was 88 per cent. These terrible, powerful drugs mimic the symptoms of dementia and Alzheimer's disease.

Many people have stories of relatives entering homes frail but with alert minds. Within weeks, they are put on regular prescribed medication. It becomes routine and they are turned into zombies with a poor quality of life. The study that I mentioned visited hospitals with a pharmacist and a doctor and examined all the medication that the elderly took. They were able to reduce it by at least half. Each individual was taking an average of six drugs. Some had been taking them for years and did not realise why. It had all been forgotten. The interactions between drugs were doing great harm. Neuroleptic drug use was cut enormously. The result was a better quality of life. People returned to being sensible and taking an interest in what was happening around them and they lived longer.

That is going on now in this country. We must address it. I hope that there will be support for a Bill that will come up during the slaughter of the innocents this Friday when 60-odd Bills come before Parliament. I hope that no Conservative King Herod will kill them all. We must address the problem. The Bill chimes in with what the Government are doing by saying that we need transparency. The Government have a battery of measures to ensure that we can know what is happening. When we find a residential home where 100 per cent. of residents are on neuroleptic drugs, that cannot possibly be right. The savings which can be made by dealing with this issue can be applied to other areas of care in the homes which greatly benefit people.

Drugs are misused in many other parts of the health service. We know about antibiotics, with the creation of methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus. The philosophy of medicine is vast over-use of drugs because of the commercial interests and bodies that press, influence and lobby us and the health service to oversell drugs. We have become a society that does not want to accept the human condition. If we are sadder today than yesterday, we feel that we need a pill to take. For every discomfort, grief or pain, we think that there is an answer. Common sense tells us that someone suffering from a bereavement must suffer, weep and wail. We cannot smother it with drug-created euphoria, because the grief will recur in a more damaging form.

People going to hospital will routinely be told that they have to take daily pain-killers when they are not in pain, just in case, or anti-depressants when they feel happy. Huge amounts of drugs are then given to counteract the effects of other drugs. When the House meets in 50 years, our time will be seen as a period when people were obsessed and our lives full of drug use. That is the main heresy of our time.

The answer to many of our problems is not to be found in superficial measures. People are far better on a waiting list than having their babies attended at Bristol royal infirmary or having a dodgy hip replacement. We must examine the quality of the health service. That is the measure that will improve things. We must escape from the present situation, where so much of the health service is driven not by the needs of patients but by the greedy needs of commerce to make extra profits.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): I am conscious that we have far too little time, so I shall be brief. I thank the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) for giving us the opportunity to say thank you to the national health service. On behalf of my Liberal Democrat colleagues, I pay tribute to that 50 years of history. We stake our claim to the genesis of the NHS. After the Webbs in the 1920s, Beveridge in the 1930s and 1940s—he was briefly a Liberal Member of Parliament and then a peer—wrote the report that said that a precondition of a welfare state was a national health service that dealt with all conditions. For those who have not read it yet, I recommend the book by Nick Timmins as a very good and timely read about the history of the welfare state in those great days.

Nye Bevan did the country proud and the Labour Government did the country right after the war. The rest of us have a duty to build on the basis of that. We could all eulogise the good things that the health service has done in all four countries of the United Kingdom, this great capital city and our constituencies. I add my words of thanks to those who work and have worked for the health service, not only at the sharp end—consultants doing difficult and acute operations every day, experts in paediatrics and intensive care—but people such as health visitors going out and about and those who work for environmental health improvement. As the right hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) said, for every curative health service, we need a preventive health service to match. The two work hand in hand.

Like others, like the House as a whole and, thank goodness, like almost everyone in Parliament, we are committed to retaining in this country a health service free at the point of delivery. I have seen the recent figures. We spend £45 billion a year on the health service. Last year, 30 million people used it. That means that for every person who used it, it cost £1,500. For all of us, who might need it any day, it costs less than £1,000 a year. We pay 6.5p in the pound in tax for the NHS. It is very good value for money.

The debate, which I welcome, is about what the health service should do in the years to come. My colleagues and I believe that we have to connect—in Forster's words, "only connect"—the funders and the job. We have to agree as far as possible what the NHS should do, what is the core service, what is the provision. The Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), was honest enough yesterday to admit to the House that in some parts of the country services are available while in other parts they are not. He said that we should have parity of service. I share that view. The public want to be engaged. I read in the newspapers today that a survey by the Institute of Health Services Management for the conference down the road reveals that one of the things that matters most to people is what the health service does, and that they want much more involvement in the debate about what it does. I hope that, in future, the debate about the boundaries of the NHS will become a public, orderly and regular debate and one in which we can all take part. If things cannot be agreed nationally, our local councils and health authorities—we believe that they should be together—should be able to decide to add on services and to raise the money locally to do so.

I welcome the fact that the Government are soon to announce significant amounts of money for the health service. All the indications are good. I will not be churlish. I shall analyse the figures carefully and see how much the real increase is in percentage terms. I shall criticise it if it is not enough, but the recognition that we need a lot more money to catch up and then consistent increased growth to sustain the health service is welcome. The Minister knows the priorities. A health service cannot be run without staff. The right hon. Member for Wealden has made the point that we are desperately short of staff. We have to find incentives to people to train and stay with the health service.

We need capital to provide the buildings. I share the scepticism of the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent about the private finance initiative, as do my colleagues. We need an information technology base to ensure that we make efficient use of our resources. I share the view of the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) that far too many drugs are given to people, and that we depend on drugs far too much. If we can massively reduce the drugs bill and improve health in a drug-free way, we shall be doing the country a good service.

My pager—as well as warnings through the press—tells me that the Secretary of State has announced to the conference in Earls Court the Commission for Health Improvement. In our manifesto—the health section of which I drafted last year—we said that there should be an inspectorate of health and social care. I welcome the commission, on which I gather there will be consultation. I put it to the Minister that there should be—the consultation paper appears in the Minister's hands as if by magic—regular inspection similar to Office for Standards in Education inspections of schools. Any patient or health service professional should be able to telephone the commission and ask it to go in and inspect a GP, hospital or clinic if he does not think that they are doing the job properly. The stronger the commission is, the better. That is where we get a quality health service.

In the 50 years to come, the NHS will be coming home. In the next couple of years we shall, in effect, have four national health services in the four countries of the United Kingdom—one in Wales, one in Northern Ireland, one in Scotland and one in England. I welcome that. The respective services may take on a different style, but it will be no less a national health service. I hope that it will be the people's health service and not the professionals' health service, and that people will have a greater say.

The Secretary of State said yesterday that waiting lists were the supertanker that was turning round. We shall debate that later, but for today we need to say that the NHS is the flagship of the public service fleet. The higher the flag flies, the more contented and healthy the people are. We salute it and wish it a successful voyage in all the 50 years ahead.

12.5 pm

Ms Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North): I am pleased to speak in this historic debate on the national health service. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) on securing a debate this week on the anniversary of the NHS. I represent a Cardiff seat but, like my hon. Friend, I come from the south Wales valleys. I am proud of the fact that the NHS was born in Wales. I strongly support the principle behind it—that it should be free at the point of delivery—which has been covered in many of the speeches today.

[Ms Julie Morgan]

I want to focus briefly on some of the key issues that face the NHS today, all of which have arisen in my constituency. I represent a constituency in which there is an excessive number of hospitals. We have three major hospitals in Cardiff, North—Velindre, which is the major cancer hospital in Wales, the University Hospital of Wales, a major teaching hospital, and Whitchurch hospital, a psychiatric hospital. The nature of the first two hospitals means that many of the issues that are brought to me are of an acute nature, involving people who are very sick, their families, or their doctors. They are about treatment for very sick people. The Government's emphasis on public health, preventive care and the links with bad housing, poverty and the minimum wage—all those issues that have been raised today—is of tremendous importance, but we have to deal with, and debate in public, the provision of acute services. Some of those issues have been aired today.

Although some of the problems of the purchaser-provider split are being tackled, we probably still have to take further steps to reintegrate the NHS, especially in relation to acute services. Can the NHS operate properly with a split between commissioners and providers of very acute services when it is dealing with the advances in medical science that have been mentioned this morning? With advances in drug therapy for cancer, for example, is it reasonable to think that decisions about new drugs can be dealt with at a local commissioner-provider level? Will the health care commissioners have sufficient knowledge to decide which drugs to buy?

There has been much publicity lately about the improvement in cancer care in the United Kingdom, but also about how much it lags behind that in other countries. The figures are sometimes dramatic. Survival rates for different cancers vary enormously throughout the world. The publicity around cancer care raises public expectations. I believe that it is right that they are raised and that people should know about advances and treatments that might be available. However, that presents a dilemma about how to deal with that knowledge and deliver the service.

One problem, especially in relation to cancer treatment, is that much of the research is in the hands of the pharmaceutical companies, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) said. It is a big issue—and a big debate, which we must have. We have to decide who is to have treatment and what treatment should be made available.

The other big issue that has come up in my constituency is acute heart surgery. The proposed heart transplant unit in Wales has been on then off, on then off, for the past three years. Before the Welsh Office and the University Hospital of Wales Healthcare NHS trust commit to it, the views of all the health areas in south Wales have to be taken.

In 1996, the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) changed the health authority boundaries and removed the central planning capacity of the NHS in Wales to take strategic decisions about the provision of services such as the heart transplant unit for Wales and the ability to top-slice health authorities. That meant that the planning mechanism for those acute services had gone. There have been about three years of discussion and waiting to see whether the heart transplant unit will be provided in Wales. Wales should have such a unit. There is much discussion about the rebranding of Wales, and a top heart transplant unit is one of the greatest services that could be provided: heart transplantation is becoming common and should be available locally.

In September, the paediatric heart surgeon at the University Hospital of Wales in my constituency, who has had tremendous success in treating children with severe heart problems and has built up the unit, is to return to Italy. He has an empty theatre in which to operate, but he does not have the nurses and the paediatric intensive care beds to do the amount of surgery that he wants to do. It is frustrating not to have the ability to develop that work at the hospital. At the same time as that surgeon is leaving for Italy, the cardiologist is leaving to go to Bristol. Bristol's gain is Wales's loss. The chair of cardiology in that same teaching hospital remains vacant while a decision is awaited on whether there will be transplant surgery in Wales. Everybody is waiting for everybody else, and the result is the loss of a first-class service in Wales. I appeal to the UHW and the Welsh Office to ensure that we can continue as before with paediatric cardiac work in Wales.

The same is true of other advanced treatments. The UHW has the capacity to develop advanced in vitro fertilisation treatments, but consultants have to visit health authorities to see whether people will buy their product. There must be a simpler way. The purchaser-provider split is not effective in such acute, expensive areas of medicine, but it is important to make them available.

There must be a debate on how to fund and decide health service priorities. Advanced developments must be examined strategically. The health service may face huge challenges, but this week we must celebrate 50 years of the NHS. I am proud that it was born in Wales. Health provision must continue to be free at the point of delivery, but we must find a way to make available to people the tremendous advances in health care.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I congratulate the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) on securing time to debate the important issue of the 50th anniversary of the NHS. The service is under great pressure, especially in Wales, and I hope that the Welsh assembly will formulate a policy to serve the needs of Wales. There are many reasons for differences in Wales, where there are more heart complaints and more premature deaths, and where a host of other problems are endemic. Those problems need to be addressed, and I hope that the assembly will do just that.

I have been brief, because I know that other hon. Members wish to contribute to the debate. I have jettisoned most of my speech but I am pleased, none the less, to take part in the debate.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): We welcome the debate and I congratulate the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) on securing it. I join other hon. Members in paying tribute to those who have built the health service over the past 50 years and who continue to give dedicated service. The service's 50th anniversary is the time to celebrate past achievements, to take stock of the present and to look forward to the future. The hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent ranged fairly widely in an attack on Government policy. He spoke about the minimum wage, the private finance initiative and education zones. We sympathise with what he said about the situation in Wales and I assure him that the Opposition will listen to what the people of Wales have to say over the next few months. Other hon. Members struck a more consensual tone. I was delighted to listen to my right hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) and to the hon. Members for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and for Cardiff, North (Ms Morgan).

The national health service is a truly national institution. It enjoys universal public appeal and no party or faction can claim ownership of it. The Beveridge report was commissioned by the wartime coalition Government, and in the 1945 general election both main parties were committed to the introduction of a universal health service that was available to all. It fell to a Labour Government to introduce the NHS in 1948, and Labour is rightly proud of that achievement. We in the Conservative party had control of the NHS for 35 of the past 50 years and we are proud of our stewardship of the service.

The NHS has prospered and grown under Conservative Governments. In the period between 1979 and 1997, NHS spending grew by 3.1 per cent. in real terms on average. Treatments went up by 3 million and the number of nurses, doctors, dentists and midwives increased. Capital spending increased by 50 per cent. in real terms in that time. I hope that we shall not hear from Labour Members the old, tired mythology that the NHS is somehow a product of the Labour party and that only it holds the NHS dear.

There is broad, cross-party consensus on the objectives for the modern NHS. They are to provide cost-effective, state-of-the-art health care that is free at the point of delivery and based on clinical need. There is political debate on the NHS but it is not about the objectives of the service: it is about differences in view on how best to achieve those objectives. There is an urgent need for debate on innovative and imaginative ways of ensuring the provision of the extra resources that the NHS will need to flourish and prosper in future. As medical technology develops and demography changes, the demand for more resources will increase. New technologies will allow better prediction of genetic predisposition to diseases, and that will allow preventive medicine to be better targeted. That will lead to long-term savings but it will demand greater short-term investment.

It is important to begin that innovative debate about the means of ensuring the availability of resources that the service will need in future. If the debate is to be meaningful, it is important to determine the underlying core principles that are important to patients—the users of the service—and to distinguish them from the sacred cows. The principle of universal availability on the basis of clinical need, free at the point of delivery, should be inviolable. Beyond that, the resourcing of the service should be based not on political dogma but on the determination to deliver the best possible service to users within the constraints of prudent fiscal policy.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House are proud to join in the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the NHS. The best birthday present that we, as politicians, can give the NHS is to break out of the sterile debates of the past and launch a real debate on future resourcing of the service so that it can effectively deliver a modern national health service offering the level of service that the British people are entitled to expect in the new millennium. We need a debate that acknowledges the consensus on objectives that exists across the political divide, the commitment among hon. Members on both sides of the House to the future of the NHS and the real issues of escalating demand and finite tax-based resources; recognises the reality of rationing that exists now in the system; and does not shrink from hard questions in seeking to ensure the proper resourcing of our health service.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): I am delighted to have the opportunity to respond to the debate, which has been initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith). He has secured it at an appropriate time not just for his constituents, but for the whole nation. It is particularly appropriate that it should fall to my hon. Friend to open the debate on the 50th anniversary of the NHS as one of his predecessors, Aneurin Bevan, was the founding father of our NHS. I think all hon. Members would want to pay tribute to Nye Bevan for his work, in the 1940s and subsequently, in giving the nation the sort of NHS that we have now.

This has largely not been a party political occasion, but I must point out that the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) seemed to be suffering from a slight case of selective amnesia. In 1946, when we debated this issue in the House, his party opposed the National Health Service Bill tooth and nail. It fought it throughout—on Second Reading, Third Reading, Report and subsequently.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid–Sussex): I am sorry that I was not here for the whole debate. Will the Minister acknowledge that the doctors opposed the establishment of the NHS, too? It is not a matter of pride for anyone that they should have opposed the creation of the NHS. The fact is that it is a truly wonderful service. All parties in the House should acknowledge that, and try to minimise, not maximise, the amount of politics involved.

Mr. Milburn: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I am all for keeping politics out of this place. I remind him that 90 per cent. of doctors voted in favour of the NHS in their ballot. There are interesting parallels with the situation today because, at their conference last week, 85 to 90 per cent. of general practitioners voted in favour of this Government's policy on NHS modernisation.

The NHS was founded on a simple principle: the best health services should be available to all—quality and equality. That appealed to the fair-minded people of our country then and it still appeals to them now. No one dares challenge those principles. No one says that the best health services should not be available to all. Indeed, the NHS embodies the principles in which the Government and my party believe.

We achieve more together than we do alone, and we have a duty to look after the weak as well as the strong. The NHS not only binds the nation's wounds, but binds the nation together. Each and every family in the land has a stake in the NHS and in its future. This Government were elected on the principle that the best health services should be available to all on the basis of need—not according to ability to pay or, indeed, who one's GP happens to be.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently had the honour to meet one of the first patients to be treated in the NHS, a lady called Sylvia Diggory, who summed it up far more eloquently than perhaps any hon. Member—including me—has been able to do in this debate. She said:

"Britain is one of the few countries where they feel your pulse before they feel your wallet if you collapse in the street".

That is a lasting testimony to the sort of national health service that Nye Bevan wanted to create.

It is a privilege to be a Minister with responsibility for health in the 50th year of the health service. As hon. Members will know, this Sunday, we celebrate the 50th anniversary of the founding of the NHS. My hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent reminded the House that, during the passage of the Bill, Nye Bevan talked of how the new NHS would lift the shadow from millions of homes. He was right. It is now impossible to imagine life in Britain without the NHS. Its achievements in those 50 years have been immense.

The NHS has banished the fear of being ill and becoming ill for millions of our fellow citizens. It is our country's greatest institution and it is my party's proudest achievement in government. It is living proof that public services can be both efficient and popular. Quite simply, the NHS has delivered the goods, as Nye Bevan promised it would.

I pay tribute in particular to all the people who work in the health service and who have given so much day in, day out over the past 50 years in the service of others. Without them, the achievements of the NHS simply would not happen.

Some people said in 1946, 1947 and 1948, and some people still say, that we cannot afford the best—that the principles of the NHS are not practicable, that they cannot be delivered. The past 50 years have proved those prophets of doom and gloom wrong because our NHS has served this country well for the vast majority of the time. The vast majority of patients over the vast majority of the country have received top-quality treatment and care, and the NHS has proved to be the cheapest and most cost-effective health care system in the developed world.

That is not despite the principles on which the NHS was based; it is because of those principles. Fairness and cost-effectiveness have gone together. They are two sides of the same coin. The basic financial principle of the NHS is that it is paid for out of taxation and free to people when they use it. That is a fine principle and, contrary to what the right hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) said, it is also phenomenally efficient because it avoids the horrendous costs of paperwork that are inevitable in any system where patients have to pay for treatment.

That is the main reason why our system is so cost-effective. It puts a bigger proportion of resources into patient care, and a lower proportion into paperwork, than any other system. That is true even now, when we still suffer from the after-effects of the competitive internal market. It is one of the reasons why the Government are sweeping away the internal market, but it is not the only reason. The internal market introduced a new competitive ethos into the NHS that was anathema to the basic principles of the NHS. It was also deeply inefficient.

Our NHS is based on the basic common-sense idea that we achieve more together in partnership than if we compete. It is that idea of partnership and co-operation—helping each other out—that is at the heart of the NHS. Indeed, it is one of the reasons why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has proposed a series of trust mergers to cover the Principality.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent has concerns about those issues. My right hon. Friend has been here to listen to those concerns. He has listened to them in the past. My understanding is that what is taking place is a genuine consultation, where the views that my hon. Friend and his constituents have expressed will be taken into account when final decisions are taken.

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth): On the issue of the trust merger in Gwent, may I assure my hon. Friend that all the Government's priorities and policies will be fulfilled if we have a separate trust for north Gwent?

Mr. Milburn: I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales was listening to that intervention, and that those considerations will be taken into account when final decisions are taken.

As hon. Members have said, this is a great time for looking back and celebrating what we have achieved, but it is important also that we look forward and that, in particular, we look to build the sort of modern and dependable health service that people want. That is what the Government are committed to doing. That is why we are intent on cutting waiting lists, and are now achieving that. That is why we are intent on enshrining quality at the heart of the NHS; my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has launched a consultation on how we better ensure quality and transparency for all patients in the NHS. That is why we want a much more integrated form of care than was ever possible under the internal market. We want to break down barriers between services—between health care, social care and housing care—so that patients receive the benefit of all those services. The patient should be at the heart of the national health service.

We also realise, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent asked us to do, that—if we are to improve the health of the nation, and, more important, if we are to improve the health of the poorest at a faster rate than the health of the overall population—we will have to tackle the root causes of ill health, which means tackling poverty, creating jobs, building homes and greening the environment.

The Government have embarked on the biggest anti-poverty, pro-health crusade that the United Kingdom has seen in two decades. To underpin that crusade, we shall annually invest more in the national health service, as we promised to do. We have embarked on the biggest new hospital building programme that the national health service has ever seen.

On the private finance initiative, I remind my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent that the Government were elected—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order.

Pedlars

12.30 pm

Dr. Peter Brand (Isle of Wight): I am grateful for the opportunity of raising the issue of pedlars. I have been supported on the issue in an early-day motion that has been signed by hon. Members on both sides of the House. We have also tabled questions on the issue to the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth). I am grateful that he will respond to this debate.

There are significant problems associated with people who trade on the streets, whether they are pedlars or street traders. I should like to concentrate particularly on the issue of pedlars. I believe that they create unfair competition, are poorly controlled, cause great problems for local police forces and are certainly a major headache for environmental health, trading standards and local government licensing officers.

I am sure that pedlars once served an extremely useful function in spreading goods round rural communities, such as my own. However, they used to work on foot within a local district, and the fact that they were licensed by a local police authority was entirely appropriate if they restricted their activity to within that authority. Unfortunately, now any pedlar can get a licence from his or her own local police force and operate anywhere within England and Wales. Although I am sure that the Pedlars Act 1871 was entirely relevant to its time, I am not quite sure whether it is entirely appropriate now, especially as we move towards the millennium.

I have received considerable representations on the issue. I am particularly grateful to my colleague, Alan Hersey, a local councillor on the Isle of Wight, who first brought it to my attention. Concern about the matter has been very strongly expressed by carnival committees, bonfire societies and other organisers of voluntary events.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): My hon. Friend mentioned carnival committees. He may be aware that we have a thriving carnival tradition in Somerset. Many of the carnival committees and other clubs in my constituency are concerned that the effect of the 1871 Act has been to divert funds from collections at carnivals and from charitable purposes to private hands. Those organisations look forward to a revision of the law that will deal with the situation.

Dr. Brand: I am grateful for that intervention, and shall touch on that issue as I develop my speech. My hon. Friend also provided a demonstration of the fact that the matter is one not purely for the Isle of Wight—although we probably have more carnival committees per head of population than anywhere else in the country.

Pedlars are a particular problem for areas that are dependent on seasonal trade. Established traders, who have to be in such areas the year round, are undercut and damaged severely by—dare one say it—fly-by-night pedlars dropping in, creaming off the profits and then disappearing again.

It might be helpful if I reminded the House of a few facts. Pedlars are supposed to trade only on foot, although they are allowed to push barrows. They are not supposed to be in the same place for more than an hour, but are supposed to move a bit each time that they make a sale. One can readily realise the impossibility of policing such regulations. I know that many local authority officers have spent many hours video-taping suspect traders in the hope of securing a prosecution, which is extremely hard to bring.

Pedlars are known only to their own local police authority. There is no obligation on their part to inform police in the place where they are operating. Although they have to show a pedlar's licence when apprehended, they are allowed to carry on the trade for which they have been licensed if they are on the public roads—which presents the problem for charity organisers who hold events on public land. It is not unusual for pedlars to move from one such event to the next, creaming off the take that really should be going to the societies organising the event.

Not only is it important for carnival committees or bonfire societies themselves to receive an income from the events that they organise—if they do not, they cannot continue operating, and it has been very difficult for some organisations to continue operating—but, when they are in surplus, they are big contributors to local charities. We should encourage such practices as a part of the great diversity and richness of the British tradition.

Pedlars pay only £12.50 annually for a licence. Street traders usually have to pay up to 100 times that amount to be licensed by a local authority. Again, it shows that there is an unfair competition.

Street traders, whose goods can be checked by local authorities, are often undercut by pedlars working in the same area. In my constituency, many street traders provide valuable employment by selling well-made, locally produced goods. Pedlars coming in undercut those street traders, very often with shoddy goods that are very difficult to return as the pedlars move off immediately once one discovers that a new watch has fallen to bits or that those new bright lights no longer shine.

Street traders are strictly controlled. Before they are given a licence, nuisance to local tenants and competition with other shops and cafes are carefully considered, and noise and smell nuisance are taken into account by local authorities, which find it extremely difficult to exercise the same types of control over the peddling fraternity.

There is some evidence that, because their goods are not controlled, pedlars can do harm to the general public. There have been cases of goods, especially toys, being sold that would not have been approved by local trading standards officers. However, in such cases—especially if there is no organisation sending pedlars out—it is extremely difficult to attribute blame if something happens. The idea of caveat emptor is a wonderful one. However, when in the middle of a charity event a child wants a specific teddy, it is very difficult to say no. Moreover, nowadays people expect goods on sale to be of a marketable quality. I am afraid that, because of the loophole in current legislation, we are failing in meeting such expectations.

As I said, it is difficult for police to take action if pedlars are not breaking a criminal law. It is also extraordinarily difficult and time consuming to have to establish that pedlars have not moved the appropriate number of times. Such exercises are extremely expensive for local authorities.

I should like to return very briefly to the harm that peddling does to charitable organisations. It is important that we continue to support and enable community organisations—which very much are community-based organisations—to continue with activities such as providing carnival floats and organising local bonfires, fetes and other village green activities. It is not unreasonable to allow organisers of such events to recoup some of their expense, by licensing agreements with the local authority, to pay for the associated costs of the carnival, fireworks or bonfire. Many societies are on the brink of failure because their finances are being severely damaged by people coming from far away whose only purpose is to cream off some money and then disappear. These people make no contribution to the local community, unlike local shopkeepers, local street traders and, of course, the organisers of charitable events.

It is not in order for me to ask for a change to the legislation. I know that the Home Office has had the issue of pedlars and their licensing under review since 1994, so I hope that it is in order for me to ask the Minister when that review will be published and what the Government's plans are to deal with an extraordinarily anomalous situation.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand) for initiating this debate. This is not a subject that often gets an airing in the House, but I know from my correspondence with him, to which he referred, that it is one which in some areas gives rise to considerable concern.

Pedlars have long been a feature of life in this country, but many people are unclear about precisely what the term means today. To some it is an anachronism with little relevance to modern life. A quick glance at the Pedlars Act 1871—and, indeed, the subsequent legislation of 1881—supports the view that the hon. Gentleman expressed. For example, references to "caster of metals", "mender of chairs" and a person who "travels and trades" without any horse or other beast "bearing or drawing burden" certainly prompt questions about the continued relevance of the legislation.

However, there is no doubt that peddling continues to be a distinctive method of trading, even though the nature of the business may have changed. For example, certain door-to-door salesmen are classified as pedlars, although that by no means covers the wide range of people who conduct their business by calling at people's homes.

It is the type of pedlar who plies his trade in busy streets in the centres of towns and cities who is of particular concern to the hon. Gentleman and to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath). As the hon. Member for Isle of Wight says, in law pedlars are not street traders and are subject to different regulations. Councils can designate streets for street trading, and street traders must obtain from the local authority a licence, or at least a consent, to trade in those streets, usually from a specific pitch. They must also pay the requisite fees and charges and observe various conditions.

On the other hand, a pedlar obtains a certificate from the police for only a modest fee. This allows the pedlar to conduct his or her trade anywhere in the United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman referred to some of the difficulties to which that might give rise in that the certificate is issued in one area but can apply in other areas. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point very well.

The essential point is that pedlars are expected to move from place to place. Court judgments in recent years have tended to confirm this. The effect of those judgments is that a pedlar must keep on the move, apart from when conducting a sale. This gives a useful pointer to the type of trader we are talking about. We have all seen people wandering the streets with, typically, foil balloons, T-shirts or similar items for sale. Those traders are clearly pedlars.

The hon. Gentleman described the problems which he says are being caused by pedlars in his area. If he did not go so far as to say that the law favours pedlars, he suggested that it needed some adjustment and should be changed accordingly. I shall return to that issue shortly.

Perhaps I should comment on the rationale behind the present arrangements. Street trading is a more regulated and costly business than peddling because it is a more substantial operation. A street trader can establish a fixed pitch, which will inevitably involve the local authority in cleaning and other costs that we can fairly readily imagine.

Dr. Brand: In practice, it is often extremely difficult to spot the difference between a pedlar and a trader, other than the fact that the pedlar has to move on. Traders and pedlars leave the same amount of litter, but street traders are rather more responsible because they know that they risk losing their pitch.

Mr. Howarth: That is precisely the point that I was making. A street trader may leave a mess but the process is properly regulated. The difference is that he has the opportunity to sell a wide range of goods and to build up a regular turnover, customer recognition and, in some cases, customer loyalty. I say that, not in defence of pedlars, but merely to draw attention to the fact that there is a crucial distinction.

A pedlar who is genuinely operating as a pedlar has no fixed spot. He must keep on the move, which means that there are fewer associated costs. It also means that he is limited to selling only those goods he can carry. Pedlars are therefore offering a rather different service from that offered by street traders. That is reflected in the "lighter touch" regulation that they enjoy.

I understand how frustrating it must be for established traders to face competition from what are in effect opportunistic operators. It is clearly wrong that licensed street traders, who have responsibilities and expenses, lose business to fly-by-night, unlicensed competitors. It is not entirely clear how far the problems we have heard about today are caused, or exacerbated, by unlicensed street traders as opposed to genuine pedlars.

The fact is that anyone who simply sets up a pitch, or conducts business from a stationary position, in a designated street, is likely to be engaging in unlicensed trading. This attracts a maximum penalty of a £1,000 fine. This would be the case even if the person concerned produced a pedlar's certificate. The courts have made this clear. The question is whether a pedlar remained on one spot for any length of time, so effectively inviting customers to come to him. If so, he would be street trading without the necessary authority.

Unauthorised traders can pose significant problems, particularly in town centres at busy times. I accept that, as the hon. Gentleman said, they can cause a real headache for local authorities in terms of enforcing the law, which can become a difficult and burdensome process. In some cases, there could be problems in establishing the point at which a pedlar—with or without a certificate—is actually engaged in unlicensed street trading. The fact remains, however, that in these circumstances remedies are available. Anyone who acts as a pedlar without a valid certificate is also liable to prosecution. In addition, he may be causing an obstruction under the Highways Act 1980.

There have been suggestions that the sentences available to the courts are inadequate. The hon. Gentleman referred to that implicitly, if not explicitly.

Dr. Brand: I am grateful to the Minister for trying to read my mind, but that is not the case. The problem is in securing a conviction. It is extremely difficult to get the evidence on which to convict. I hear what the Minister says, but as his speech progresses I hope that he will comment on whether it is still appropriate for someone who is supposed to trade on foot to travel in a car, or by coach or lorry, from the area in which he has been given his licence and then to walk but use the vehicle as a base.

Mr. Howarth: That is an interesting point and I shall reflect on it. I do not want to give a precipitate answer that would not necessarily be helpful to the hon. Gentleman, so I shall write to him and attempt to provide some sensible guidance as to how an authority should operate in those circumstances.

Mr. David Heath: I am most grateful to the Minister. Will he also touch on the competition with charitable collections, particularly in the context of carnivals, which by definition move around? The current position is perverse, as the Charities Act 1992 makes it more difficult to obtain a licence to collect money for charitable purposes than to obtain a pedlar's licence and extract money from the same crowd under what I consider to be a false pretext.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who raised that point in an earlier intervention. I shall comment on it later in my speech.

Our general policy on sentencing levels is to ensure that they are proportionate to the degree of mischief caused. Before we make any decision to increase the penalties available, we need to look carefully at a number of factors, including the sentencing practice of magistrates within the existing scale. The information available suggests that the sentences imposed for street trading and peddling offences generally fall well short of the maximum. There must therefore be real doubts as to whether increasing the level of fine, for example, would make any appreciable difference. As the hon. Member for Isle of Wight said, there may be other ways of facilitating prosecution and I promise to look into that.

It is sometimes said that pedlar's certificates are used as a cover for unlicensed street trading. I know that some pedlars attempt to exploit the certificate in that way, but the number of pedlar's certificates issued—around 2,000 a year—appears to be declining. On the other hand, reports of unlicensed street trading are on the increase. It is a persistent problem in many areas. It is arguable whether the presence of pedlars makes matters a great deal worse. Many of those involved in unlicensed street trading are not pedlars and, what is more, make no claim to be so. I know from my own experience on Merseyside where there is a particular problem. I have had direct experience of it in the centre of Liverpool so I do not want to underplay it.

I understand why street traders and other businesses may feel that even genuine pedlars present unfair competition. After all, they are exempt from street trading controls and, as the hon. Gentleman rightly pointed out, their costs are lower. However, a bona fide pedlar has to be able to carry his wares. Given the more limited range of goods that he can sell, I am not sure how far he can be said to damage the business of street traders. It could be argued that the competition offered by pedlars is no more unfair than that between street traders and small shops—it is a matter of different considerations—or between small shops and out-of-town stores. Pedlars often quickly move on. Many people will therefore choose to buy goods from more established traders whom they will inevitably regard as more reliable.

Dr. Brand: I am sorry to ask your indulgence again, but there is a significant difference between the various groups that you have mentioned and pedlars.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that he should be using the third person.

Dr. Brand: Does the Minister agree that there is a substantial difference in that the list of activities that he mentioned are all either licensed by or governed by planning controls and are subject to the local authority and the anomaly is that there is absolutely no local control over pedlars?

Mr. Howarth: Of course, but planning controls invariably relate either to pitches in the case of street traders or fixed location properties and it would be difficult to apply them to somebody who, by definition, must keep moving. Of course I accept that additional controls apply to other traders.

As the hon. Gentleman has made clear, in the Isle of Wight there are particular worries about the practice and the standard of goods on offer. Unscrupulous operators are clearly a menace and the licensing of street traders and certification of pedlars is designed to reduce that risk. Consumer protection legislation applies just as much to goods bought from street traders or pedlars as to those purchased from other outlets. I recognise, of course, that such traders—particularly pedlars—may be rather more difficult to track down. However, a customer can, and should, ask to see a pedlar's certificate before buying from someone on that basis. Most people are fairly cautious about what they are prepared to hand over money for in the street, although particularly in places such as the Isle of Wight, and perhaps Somerset, many people are on holiday so their defences may be somewhat lowered.

The hon. Members for Isle of Wight and for Somerton and Frome mentioned charitable collections. I share their concern about the abuse of the pedlar's certificate for fraudulent charity collections. Where individuals collect money or sell goods on behalf of a named charity, the promoters are required to obtain a licence from the local authority. Part III of the Charities Act 1992, which has yet to be implemented, will simplify and strengthen the existing controls. However, the issues involved are indeed complex and the Government are considering when and how the measure might be implemented.

I accept that a pedlar's certificate may make life easier for those determined to mislead the public. Unfortunately, carnivals—to which both hon. Gentlemen referred—or similar large-scale events, will always attract such characters. I shall give further thought to the real and serious points that both hon. Gentlemen have raised and if there is anything that we can usefully do, I shall notify the House in a suitable manner.

As the hon. Member for Isle of Wight said, in 1994 the previous Government began reviews of pedlars and street trading legislation. I should make it clear that they did so in the context of their deregulation exercise. The aim of the reviews was to see whether the burdens imposed by the legislation could be reduced, but some complex issues were raised and the responses to both reviews were very mixed. In the case of the pedlars legislation they were fairly evenly divided, but a small majority favoured strengthening the controls.

The hon. Gentleman has argued for pedlars to be brought within street trading controls. That would require primary legislation and he realises the difficulty involved in that. We need to recognise that such an option is available, but be cautious about using it. Nevertheless, I shall certainly consider the points he has made about the problems posed by pedlars. Similar arguments were raised in some of the responses to the 1994 consultation paper and I accept that they are the subject of real concern.

At this stage I have reached no firm conclusions about the merits of further action in relation to either pedlars or street traders. Although I am not yet persuaded that increasing controls on pedlars would greatly alleviate the difficulties experienced by street traders and local authorities, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I will look carefully at the issues in considering our future policy. In doing that, I shall reflect carefully on the points that he and the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome have raised during the debate.

Reefs

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Only those who, like my hon. Friend the Minister and me, have had the good luck to swim in one can appreciate the full glory that is a coral reef. There are many reasons, medicinal and otherwise, why they are important as the cradle of fish. I thank the two young RAF officers who took me diving at an enforced stop at Gan in the Indian ocean while I was returning from an Inter-Parliamentary Union armed forces visit in 1965. I shall for ever be grateful for the opportunity to swim in the Indian ocean, which led to a lifelong interest.

The World Conservation Monitoring Centre in Cambridge, in particular Dr. Mark Spalding and the director Dr. Mark Collins, together with its associates in the United States and the Philippines, has produced an important report on the state of the world's coral reefs, called "Reefs at Risk". I should like to use my luck in securing this debate to bring the issue to the top of the Minister's in-tray. So many important reports get publicity and then gather dust.

"Reefs at Risk" highlights the crucial role of coral reefs in alleviating poverty—by supplying food and foreign tourist income—and as a natural coastal defence. Many of our fellow Commonwealth nations have coral reefs, including some of the poorest nations. Do the Government agree that the conservation of such natural resources is fundamental to their policies for poverty alleviation? I applaud my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development and my hon. Friend the Minister for putting poverty alleviation at the top of their agenda. What can the Government do to support integrated sustainable development and coastal conservation in such countries?

The UK is among the largest coral reef nations, with more than 6,000 sq km of coral reef located in our overseas territorial waters. "Reefs at Risk" says that many of those reefs, particularly in the Caribbean, are in areas of high risk from human damage. Praise is certainly due to territories that have set aside marine parks and the resources to manage those sites, but the majority of coral reefs in those territories remain without any form of legal protection. What further measures do the Government propose to protect and manage those precious resources?

Proposals exist for a massive development of condominiums and a deep water harbour in East Caicos, Turks and Caicos Islands, which will include building work and degradation in an existing national park. Similar destructive developments are planned on some of the small islets off Anguilla, including the development of a rocket launching station at Sombrero Cay. Will the Government give a complete assurance that they will not allow those developments to take place at the expense of coral reefs?

The Government's new British Indian ocean territory conservation policy, covering the UK's largest area of reefs, which includes some of the most pristine reefs in the Indian ocean, is an important step forward that deserves high praise. What progress is being made towards the designation of Ramsar sites and strict nature reserves in that area, as laid out in paragraph 19 of "Reefs at Risk"? Will the Government also give an assurance that they will continue to maintain a fisheries patrol to prevent further illegal fishing incursions into the region from neighbouring countries?

I am on delicate ground here. I believe—this is not a universal belief—that fisheries protection is essential. A naval presence is necessary to protect the reefs from the depredation of Taiwanese, South Korean and other massive fishing trawlers that hoover up the bottom of the sea. I point out to my hon. Friend the Minister with some shyness that there is a huge base at Diego Garcia, which is British territory, not American, albeit that the base there is the biggest outside the continental United States. It would not be impossible to have a naval presence. I am not asking for an answer on that delicate issue today, but at least the Department might reflect on it.

Noting the Government's continued support for biodiversity conservation through the Darwin initiative and this country's position in coral reef conservation and science, it is surprising that the Darwin initiative has selected few, if any, reef projects. Does the new report provide a useful basis on which to prioritise and support future projects?

Will the Government consider supporting similar analyses for other coastal ecosystems that are vital for the people who live there? I am thinking particularly of mangrove ecosystems and poorly known but equally important seagrass beds. Part of the problem is that the huge fish that are found in reefs are extremely valued in places such as Hong Kong. They are captured live and set out in stalls, fetching huge sums. There is also a great temptation to catch fish for aquariums. We human beings must make up our minds what we are going to do about the problem, because sooner rather than later the great glories that are the ecosystems of the coral reefs will be in danger.

It is my wont to be lucky in Adjournment debates. As many of those who will read the report of this debate are understandably more interested in what the Government have to say than in what I have to say, I shall give ample opportunity to my hon. Friend, who has taken a deep personal interest in the issue. I place on record my thanks to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister and to their ever-helpful officials, who have also displayed a passionate interest.

1.5 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. George Foulkes): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on his success in securing yet another Adjournment debate. When I was an Opposition Back Bencher, I knew how difficult it was. My hon. Friend has a talent that all Back Benchers should try to emulate. I also congratulate him on his interest in science, particularly this important issue. I understand that he is the parliamentary correspondent of the New Scientist and that he takes an interest in a range of issues in that capacity.

The Government also welcome the recent publication, "Reefs at Risk". We are glad for this opportunity to outline our response to this important environmental and development challenge. My hon. Friend has given me plenty of time to do so. In passing, I should like to point out that it is a great tribute to the House of Commons—readers of Hansard and visitors should note this—that we can move seamlessly from the problems of pedlars in the Isle of Wight to issues relating to coral reefs in oceans around the world.

The Government consider the publication of the report a timely wake-up call to the global community. This is the year of the oceans. As my hon. Friend will know, the G8 Environment Ministers agreed in April to promote greater and more co-ordinated action on marine biodiversity. We are at one with my hon. Friend in his concerns.

The coral reefs of tropical oceans are renowned for their beauty, as my hon. Friend and I have experienced from swimming in the oceans. I saw for myself in Belize and more recently in Nassau the beauty of the coral reefs, so I can underline what my hon. Friend said about that. They are also important as centres of biodiversity and a source of livelihood for many poor people. Television and tourism mean that even in our northern location—my hon. Friend and I live in relatively far northern locations—we are increasingly aware of the intrinsic values of the coral reef. We are often less aware of the threats to reefs, which the report brings out well.

The principal causes of decline are clear: there are five. The first is unmanaged coastal development where there is an inadequate institutional and legislative framework to ensure proper resource management. The second is over-exploitation of particular goods and services by destructive fishing or intensive tourism and the marine curio trade. The third is land-based pollution from domestic, industrial and agricultural sources. As tourism grows, such pollution increases. The fourth is sea-based pollution from mineral exploitation and cruise ships. The fifth and final cause is climate change and tropical storms, which physically damage the coral reefs. The challenge for us all is effectively to address those causes while, at the same time, meeting the legitimate development needs of increasing numbers of people and reducing the number of people living in absolute poverty.

I was grateful to my hon. Friend not just for mentioning the White Paper and the Government's commitment to poverty elimination but for his endorsement of it. The key aim of the Government's international development programme is the elimination of poverty. If he does not mind, I shall correct him slightly. He used the old term "alleviation". We are making it clear that we want not alleviation but elimination and eradication of poverty in poorer countries through the promotion of sustainable development. Our specific objectives are: policies and actions that promote sustainable livelihoods, better education, health and opportunities for poor people, and protection and better management of the natural and physical environment, which is what this debate is about.

The Government strongly support—indeed, they have been a leading proponent of—the international development targets to reduce by one half the proportion of people living in extreme poverty by 2015, and to implement national strategies for sustainable development in all countries by 2005, so that we can ensure that trends in the loss of environmental resources are effectively reduced at both global and national levels by 2015.

Concern in the United Kingdom over declining coral reef resources is not new. The Government and their predecessors have been aware of the issue for some time and have funded studies by some of the British scientific institutions, which have well-deserved international reputations for excellence in coral reef research.

I should emphasise that the degradation of the coral reef systems and other tropical coastal ecosystems, such as mangrove forests, which my hon. Friend mentioned in particular, can have a devastating impact on the livelihoods of very poor people in developing countries. I know that he is especially concerned about that. Such people, who often lack access to land or alternative forms of employment, are highly dependent on the resources and services that the reefs can offer. We must understand that, for poor coastal communities, degradation of reefs leads to loss of food security, destabilisation of the community structure and, often, migration to the urban centres, which creates increasing problems. If we are to protect coral reefs, we need to focus on the interests of local people to whom, quite understandably, global values may mean little given the grinding burden of poverty that they face. I shall offer just a few examples.

Astonishingly, coastal communities in the Maldives and Sri Lanka depend on reef fisheries for about 80 to 90 per cent. of the animal protein in their diet. In comparison, only 10 per cent. of the animal protein in the average UK diet is fish. That shows just how dependent such communities are. Furthermore, in the Maldives—a country of more than 1,000 coral islands—a recent study showed that some 17 per cent. of households have no source of income other than reef fishing, and that average household income varies between $25 and $77 a month. More than 60 per cent. of households in the coastal communities of Fiji, for example, are dependent on coral reef fisheries as a source of nutrition and income. Such dependence on the coral reef fishery is common in island states. Degradation of reefs that support the fishery can create poverty.

Other households in coastal areas are equally dependent on coral mining, which destroys reefs to manufacture lime and other building materials. In some coastal communities of east Africa, 85 per cent. of households are dependent on income from coral mining. More than 5,000 people earn a livelihood from coral mining in Sri Lanka. The ability of some coastal communities to build affordable housing depends on coral mining, yet their livelihood also depends on a healthy reef ecosystem. Such spirals of environmental degradation and poverty can be resolved only by sustainable development.

My hon. Friend raised the question of the theft of fish. Since the 1960s, Governments of south-east Asia have been concerned by the use of sodium cyanide solution to stun and capture coral reef fishes, as my hon. Friend described, which are exported for the aquarium trade. There is also some evidence of collateral damage to corals and other organisms. Regrettably, the use of sodium cyanide has become widespread, even though it is illegal in many countries. I am glad to say that the Government of the Philippines have taken a leading role in the fight against the users of sodium cyanide. In partnership with local environmental organisations, they provide training for fishermen in alternative catching techniques and have established laboratories to test live fish exports for traces of sodium cyanide. As a consequence, cyanide fishing has been reduced in the Philippines. We applaud that example of environmental management in action.

Traditional community management systems have existed in some small island states for centuries and have controlled the sustainable use of resources of coral reefs. Pressures caused by increasing populations and inappropriate or badly planned development are breaking down the long-established systems, and community-based management alone may no longer be sufficient to contain the threats to reefs.

As "Reefs at Risk" makes clear, the causes of decline in coral reef health are in any case often beyond the traditional control of coastal communities. The origin of pollution and sedimentation is often far inland. For example, the recently documented decline of a coral reef system in the Philippines identified the cause as inland logging operations, which increased soil erosion and consequent sedimentation in coastal waters, killing corals and reducing fish populations. The main benefits of logging were obtained by commercial companies. The main costs to the environment, however, were felt by the poor in the coastal community. Analysis in the Philippines demonstrated that long-term revenue from tourism and fishing on a healthy reef system would have been $40 million greater than that generated by logging. Therefore, it would have been far better to go down the tourism and fishing route. We must encourage more of such analyses, as well as planning mechanisms that use the resulting information.

My hon. Friend put his finger on the key to the issue. An integrated approach to planning is essential if Governments are to protect the coral reefs and the livelihoods that depend on them. The Government are committed to such an approach in our development co-operation programme. There is a recognised planning framework to achieve it, which is known as integrated coastal management. That enables communities to participate with the Government in the identification and management of competition and conflict in the use of coastal resources. The Government have helped to introduce integrated coastal management, to address coastal resource use issues in coral reef and mangrove management on the island of Sumatra in Indonesia, and in South Africa. We are also funding research to resolve resource use conflicts in coastal areas of Sri Lanka and Vietnam. A great deal is being done by our Department in integrated coastal management.

Mr. Dalyell: I can confirm what the Minister has said. I attended the recent seminar at Canning house, which he will know well from the days before he was a Minister. When I asked about the reefs report, the Mexican ambassador, Mr. Ornate, confirmed the value of joint projects in the Caribbean, so it is not only the Government who say that such co-operation is good, but the Mexican ambassador speaking on behalf of the Latin American ambassadors.

Mr. Foulkes: I accept what my hon. Friend says. Other Governments are increasingly concerned about the matter. Canning house provides an excellent forum for such discussions.

My hon. Friend would agree that the basis of planning is knowledge, and the "Reefs at Risk" report makes it clear that it is based on indications of potential threat. My Department is engaged, with a number of international and national organisations, in developing a better understanding of the relationship, which we have been discussing, between protection of the coral reef and coastal environment and the eradication of poverty in coastal communities.

Assessment of change in reefs is the first step, and we have funded the development of cost-effective methods to assess the quality of coral reefs, and provided support to, for example, British Virgin Islands and Anguilla to map their coral reefs. We were able to help the Government of the Maldives to identify the effect on their reef fisheries of coral rock mining, and subsequently to develop a management system to accelerate the recovery rate of the ruined reef.

Our current programme of support to the Intergovernmental Oceanographic Commission of UNESCO includes funding and expertise to develop a regional component of the global coral reef monitoring network, which will implement a coral reef monitoring plan in south Asia. That has produced immediate benefits in defining the extent and impact of recent damage to coral in the Indian ocean because of high sea temperatures. We have also helped the Government of Anguilla to assess the impact of tropical storms on their coral reefs and supported research to assess the potential impact of global warming on coral reefs.

I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that the UK Government have been giving a great deal of help. He has been very effective in bringing the matter to the top of the ministerial agenda in the UK.

Mr. Dalyell: I agree that the Government have been effective, but the $64 million question is how one protects coral reefs against the depredation—that is not too strong a word—of trawlers from certain countries. That begs the question whether military force can be deployed in the form of fishery protection. I do not ask for an answer to that question in an Adjournment debate, but I hope at least that the Government will discuss with UNESCO and other international authorities how the policing is to take place. In particular, I hope that they will discuss with the Americans the critical issue of the British Indian ocean territories' coral reefs and whether there should be some coral reef fishery protection operating out of Diego Garcia.

Mr. Foulkes: I shall deal directly with that question. Until 1996, the territories' Administration chartered a fisheries patrol vessel during the tuna fishing season, and only from November 1996 to February 1998 was there continuous coverage. The local Administration considered that that was not a cost-effective solution to inshore fishery protection, and the vessel was withdrawn at the end of its charter, which is what my hon. Friend was alluding to. The territories' Administration now intend to have a patrol vessel in place for the start of the next tuna fishing season in November 1998, and in the longer term, they hope to be able to purchase a vessel to ensure all-year-round cover. The Administration are actively considering how best to take that forward.

I hesitate to venture on to the subject of naval protection, which my hon. Friend mentioned, but no doubt he will be able to raise it with some of my colleagues. I hope that he will be reassured by what I have already said about the fisheries protection vessel.

My hon. Friend mentioned the Darwin initiative, which is managed by my colleagues in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. The Darwin initiative for the survival of species is a Government-funded initiative that supports the efforts of British institutions to safeguard the world's biodiversity. Since the initiative commenced, about 5 per cent. of its funds—a substantial proportion—have been invested in six projects focused on coral reefs in Belize, Egypt, Kenya, Sri Lanka, Mozambique and St. Lucia. A particularly welcome project has been helping schools in the Caribbean to implement coral reef protection policies. I know that my hon. Friend was once a teacher on a cruise ship, so he will be aware of the importance of education on that matter.

The Government also actively enforce the protection given by the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species to more than 250 species of corals used in the ornament and jewellery trades. In 1995 and 1996, customs seized more than 2,500 pieces of coral that were being imported without the necessary permits.

My hon. Friend will also welcome the fact that when the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and I attended the CARICOM conference at Nassau in February, we announced a British Government-sponsored regional workshop to consider the protection of marine biodiversity in the Caribbean region. We shall co-host that with the Government of Jamaica. The meeting will be held at the end of October at Montego Bay, which the "Reefs at Risk" report identifies as having some seriously degraded reefs. That will, we hope, concentrate the minds of the delegates at the workshop.

Mr. Dalyell: I should like to register the appreciation for the work of customs of those who are most concerned with this issue. Asking customs officers to identify coral reef is a pretty tall order, but they have done an excellent job.

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I am sure that his comment will be passed on to those concerned.

My hon. Friend mentioned overseas territories. We take seriously our responsibility to our overseas territories, and I am glad that we have been able to rename them, because overseas territories is a much more appropriate term than dependent territories. Our objective is to promote sustainable development. That requires that economic development proposals are appraised for their potential interactions with the environment.

Proposed developments in the Turks and Caicos Islands such as the East Caicos development project—which my hon. Friend mentioned—and the Grand Turk harbour development, are to be subjected to full environmental impact assessment before approval. Those assessments are to be carried out by consultants acceptable to the appropriate Government Department of the Turks and Caicos Islands. Similarly, the proposed development at Sombrero Island in Anguilla, to which my hon. Friend referred, is currently being subjected to a full environmental impact appraisal by an environmental consultancy firm, ICF Kaiser. UK Government officials have worked with ICF Kaiser to define the scope of the environmental assessment for that development, and the report will be a significant factor in deciding whether to allow the development to go ahead next year. I hope that that reassures my hon. Friend.

Given the dependence of some of the UK overseas territories on the quality and health of their coral reefs, the Government recognise that such assessments are important, and we shall offer support wherever possible. However, recent correspondence with staff at the World Conservation Monitoring Centre has suggested that the coral reefs in British overseas territories are in comparatively good condition, and we welcome that independent statement from such an authoritative source.

We greatly welcome my hon. Friend's initiative in raising the matter today. I was particularly pleased that he paid such a warm tribute to many of the members of staff of the Department, who do much to understand the issue and brief Ministers on it. The Government recognise the important role that coral reefs can and should continue to play in sustainable development. It is important not only to monitor what is happening but to develop—with the participation of local communities and using partnerships between Government, business and civil society—effective ways of managing and sustaining the goods and services that derive from coral reefs around the world. I assure the House and my hon. Friend that the British Government will, with the considerable expertise that is available in UK, continue to play a leading role.

I hope that my hon. Friend has been reassured not only on his specific points that I have dealt with, but on the general matter of our deep concern about the report. We are looking at the implications and taking serious account of it. We shall deal with all the points that arise from it.

Mr. Dalyell: Unlike my 14 Adjournment debates on Lockerbie, I should like to put it on record that I am extremely satisfied with the content and tone of my hon. Friend's reply.

Mr. Foulkes: I cannot comment on any other subject, but I thank my hon. Friend for his generous commendation.

Oxted and Limpsfield Hospital

1.29 pm

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey): I am grateful for the opportunity to bring before the House a matter that has, for some years, been the subject of grave and almost continuous concern to the people of Oxted and the surrounding area. In doing so, I am acutely aware that I am touching on issues that have divided and continue to divide the local community, health care professionals and the district council.

Let me say at once that I have not come here today with a ready-made solution to the various problems, nor am I here to carry the flag for any particular group or faction. However, I should like to thank the many people who have taken the trouble to keep me informed of developments: the health authority; the community health council; the trust; the GPs in Oxted and elsewhere; Mr. Josh Cosnett of the Save Oxted Hospital action group, who has tirelessly advanced the cause supported by many petitions; Mr. Graeme Waller; Councillor Gordon Keymer; the Rev. Guy Bennett; and others to whom the future of this vital local resource is paramount.

I make no apology for having no tailor-made remedy of my own. I have brought the matter to the House today to enable the Minister, who has more cause than most to realise that being in government is not all fun, to set out clearly and unequivocally his position and that of the Government, so that we can achieve a rapid and satisfactory outcome to a set of problems that have persisted for too long.

Let me start with a statement on which, I hope, all can agree. Oxted and Limpsfield (War Memorial) hospital, although originally sited elsewhere, was opened in its present position in 1939, and building work was completed shortly after the second world war. It was funded by public appeal. The hospital has thus served the community of Oxted and the surrounding area for nearly 60 years, providing both out-patient services and in-patient care. Not surprisingly, it has come to be regarded as a jewel in the Oxted crown. My own family has had cause to use the out-patient services, and many friends have passed through its doors or stayed overnight through the years.

The sad modern history of the hospital began about five years ago, when East Surrey Healthcare NHS trust announced that the building was in a poor—indeed, terminal—state of repair. I know that some people dispute that, but most accept it as a working proposition. A suggestion that the hospital should close and its services be relocated to the nearest accident and emergency hospital in Redhill gave rise to public outcry.

In the face of that, the trust was forced to reconsider. It came forward with a hospital redevelopment proposal, using the existing site and an adjacent one and providing 20 NHS beds. That was to be funded partly by the NHS and partly by the development of housing on the hospital grounds. That appeared to be good news, but that is the point at which trouble started and things began to go badly wrong.

After months of preparation and NHS expenses running to hundreds of thousands of pounds, the local authority, Tandridge district council, first insisted that the new housing should include additional affordable homes, and then refused planning consent on grounds of excessive density. To that frankly perverse act, we owe much of the trouble that has ensued.

Various attempts were made to recast the proposals in a form acceptable to the local authority, but they came to nothing. There was even a march through the streets of Oxted—the only march I have attended in my constituency, and possibly the only one that has ever taken place there—under the banner "Save Oxted Hospital". It is ironic that the march was also attended by several councillors who had actively participated in the demise of the original redevelopment scheme.

In March 1997, the health authority issued a consultation paper, which, after minor alteration, formed the basis of a proposal published in June 1997. It envisaged the building of a new out-patient hospital on the existing site to include therapies and an X-ray unit; and 10 NHS beds would be provided in a private nursing home. The proposal was rejected by the CHC on a number of grounds, not least that it envisaged a reduction in the number of beds from 20 to 10. Although there is disagreement in the community about where the beds should be located, there is a strong feeling that halving the number of local beds is not acceptable. The 20 beds currently available are in great demand, for both geriatric and recuperative care.

Despite the CHC's objection, on 9 September the Minister wrote to me announcing his decision to close the hospital, and to endorse the health authority's proposal. Thus, Oxted joined the list of 25 war memorial hospitals currently threatened with closure. I understand that that is to be the subject of a mass lobby next week, and recently the issue was eloquently raised in the House by my hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk (Mr. Prior).

The Minister added two provisos in his letter: first, that the 10 beds being removed from Oxted could realistically be provided in East Surrey hospital; and, secondly, that a suitable private sector partner could be found for the proposed nursing home development. The Minister will be aware that, earlier on, a possible private nursing home partner had dropped out. A deadline was set for March 1998, which was later extended, at the CHC's request, to May, primarily to accommodate discussions with a potential private sector benefactor. The second deadline has now passed: no new private sector nursing home provider has appeared, and continued bed blocking in East Surrey hospital casts doubt over whether the extra demand for beds there can be met.

Meanwhile, there have been several developments that are important to the context in which the struggle to maintain a hospital in Oxted is taking place. In no particular order, they are as follows. The East Surrey Healthcare NHS trust has merged with the Crawley Horsham NHS trust; the consequences of the merger are still being absorbed, and a new chief executive has been appointed to manage the combined trust. A new chairman will shortly take up position in the health authority.

A primary care group is being set up to embrace a huge area, from Limpsfield in the east to Reigate in the west. That is giving rise to extra bureaucracy, and it means that any decision affecting provision in Oxted must now be seen explicitly in the light of its implications for other parts of the area—for example, it is obviously important that developments at Oxted do not entail no developments in Horley.

[Mr. Peter Ainsworth]

In addition, to no one's surprise, we are told that the financial position of the health authority has deteriorated since March 1997, which is clearly unhelpful; and that the merged East Surrey and Crawley trust has a deficit of £4 million, which is hardly a propitious context in which to be considering a major investment in Oxted. I understand that that might no longer be a problem, as the latest news is that responsibility for community health care in the Oxted area is to be transferred to a trust in Croydon. However, I am told that that trust, too, has recently suffered a cut in funding. While all that turmoil is going on, nothing has been achieved to address the problems in Oxted, where, understandably, staff recruitment has become more difficult, and general frustration has mounted.

I should be grateful if the Minister could clarify certain specific questions. First—I realise that this is something of a fast ball, so perhaps he can write to me—is it true that the financial model used by the health authority to date to assess the cost of providing beds at Oxted assumes that the running costs will be the same as those in the hi-tech accident and emergency hospital at Redhill? If so, is it not rather unusual, and does the Minister believe that it is appropriate?

Secondly, does the Minister accept the view of local GPs and others, that a minimum of 20 beds is required to meet the current and growing future need of people in the locality? Thirdly, how do matters now stand between the NHS and the local private benefactor, who has reportedly promised a substantial sum towards the provision and maintenance of extra beds in Oxted? What is the Government's position on other offers of private funding from the local community for rebuilding the hospital?

Fourthly, what progress has been made towards satisfying the two provisos set out in the hon. Gentleman's letter of 9 September? Fifthly, what will happen if those cannot be met, given that the chief executive of the health authority is reported to have said on 9 March:

"We can no longer fund the current level of services in Oxted"?

Sixthly, what will happen if the district council blocks the sale of the land necessary for the building of the nursing home? What powers have the Government to get their way, assuming that there is no change in direction? As I understand it, the district authority at present intends to block the sale of that land.

Mrs. Marlow of South Thames national health service executive has written that the Minister now regards the matter as one of local interest. I ask him not to wash his hands of the issue, but to work to ensure a successful outcome, based on the Secretary of State's words:

"I have made it clear that we would like to promote community hospitals because we want people throughout the country . . . to be able to turn to an efficient, effective, high-quality health service that is close to home."—[Official Report, 27 January 1998; Vol. 305, c. 142.]

The Minister's actions over Oxted and Limpsfield war memorial hospital will be a test of that commitment.

Bearing in mind the story on the front page of The Times today, which tells us that a children's ward in Greater Manchester has been reprieved from closure on the eve of a visit from the Secretary of State, would the hon. Gentleman extend to his right hon. Friend a cordial invitation to visit Oxted hospital at his earliest convenience?

1.41 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): It is always a pleasure to reply to the hon. Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth), on this and other issues. As he said, I get to deal with many fun issues in the House, but this is not one of them. It is a serious matter, which is of concern to him and his constituents.

As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, community hospitals are a valued part of the national health service in many parts of the country. Patients often value them because they tend to deliver services in a friendly and homely way, which makes change extremely difficult. Change is not peculiar to this Government, or to the previous Government; it is endemic in the national health service, and it affects community hospitals just as it affects other parts of the service.

The hon. Gentleman is a strong supporter of Oxted and Limpsfield community hospital in his constituency, and I understand his concerns, which have also been expressed to me by local people and organisations. He will recall that I met representatives of the East Surrey community health council and the Save Oxted Hospital action group some months ago. Perhaps it would be useful if I recount how we got to the present position, and where things stand in trying to answer the hon. Gentleman's six questions.

In the first place, changes were necessary in the area, because, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said, health needs were changing, and it is broadly agreed that the hospital is in a poor state of repair. The local health authority has a responsibility to ensure that it makes the best use of the public money that it receives. It decided that it would be more cost-effective and appropriate to modern health care facilities to consider a new building in Oxted, rather than upgrading the present building.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the proposal was to provide out-patients, minor injuries, X-ray, diagnostic and physiotherapy services in a brand new NHS facility. Changes would also be made to the number of beds available—acute beds would be transferred to East Surrey hospital, and beds available for the less acutely ill would be purchased from a private nursing home and managed by local general practitioners.

As the hon. Gentleman said, following East Surrey community health council's objections to the health authority's recommendations following consultation, I considered those proposals late last year, bearing in mind all that had been said locally. When I made my decision to approve the proposals by East Surrey health authority for the re-provision of Oxted hospital, I did so on two firm conditions, and I expect those conditions to be fulfilled in full. The first was that a viable private sector nursing home partner could be found; the second that adequate provision should be made at East Surrey hospital in Redhill to absorb the likely number of elderly patients being admitted there from the Oxted area.

I asked for an implementation plan from East Surrey health authority, and I subsequently extended the deadline for the production of that plan by two months, to the end of May, to enable further local discussions to take place. The appearance on the scene of a potential local benefactor might be a help, but it has certainly also been a hindrance in delaying the implementation of the overall plan.

I made my decision because the proposals will provide modern, high-quality health care for people living in south Tandridge. There would be flexibility, with local GPs managing the beds; and acutely ill elderly people, who need consultant care in the best possible modern setting, would have a full range of back-up facilities available, which might not always be available in that sort of setting.

With regard to the private sector partner, I understand that a number of expressions of interest have been received from nursing home providers by Surrey and Sussex Healthcare NHS trust, which are subject to further discussion, and those debates continue. To build a new nursing home on the existing hospital site, a land swap will be necessary, so that the existing hospital can stay open until the new facilities are ready. I understand that discussions are taking place with Tandridge district council about the land swap.

Alternatively, the existing hospital could be closed and demolished, and a nursing home built on the existing site. If that option were chosen, I understand that the health authority would purchase beds from existing nursing homes in the Oxted area, which would be used until the new nursing home was available on the Barnett Shaw site. I will say in a moment what I expect Tandridge district council to do to be helpful.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, at present GPs have access to six beds in Oxted hospital. As a result of local concerns expressed during the consultation exercise, the health authority helpfully increased its planned re-provision from six to 10 beds, giving the GPs an increase in access to local services. I hope that he also thinks that helpful. The use of a nursing home, which is likely to have around 40 beds in total, is designed to give maximum flexibility to accommodate local needs. Therefore, 10 GP beds in the nursing home is the minimum guaranteed future commitment. If the local primary care group can arrange treatment and care differently for its patients, it may be able to care for more patients in the new facilities in Oxted, subject, of course, to other demands, such as emergencies.

On the condition concerning capacity at East Surrey hospital—another important matter that the hon. Gentleman raised, and about which I am concerned—the regional office of the NHS executive is closely monitoring the plans by the Surrey and Sussex Healthcare NHS trust for the reconfiguration of services at the acute hospitals at Crawley and Redhill. The plans will now need to take full account of changes to service levels at Oxted and access for patients in their areas. Once finalised, those plans will be subject to full consultation.

Two further issues warrant a mention. First, the re-provision is being planned at the same time as a new, modern, primary health centre is being developed in Oxted. That will provide high-quality primary care facilities for patients in the centre of the town, and will complement the hospital re-provision. The GPs in the town will have access to a range of new, high-quality primary, community and nursing home facilities, all of them readily accessible to the local population. As the local practices develop into a primary care group, they will be able to have more say in the way in which those facilities are used for their patients. Frankly, it will be for GPs to take those decisions, not bureaucrats sitting in health authority offices; I hope that the hon. Gentleman welcomes that sort of development.

There will be more flexibility for patients to be supported in their own homes, with the back-up of local, low-tech beds, and barriers between health and social care will be overcome, which is crucial, particularly to deal with the complex problems that many elderly patients often face. They require the support not merely of NHS services, but of social and housing services. The new primary care groups and the facilities that are being provided in the area will all help to that end. The availability of nursing home beds in Oxted will support primary care, and will therefore be an important element in the development of services for local people.

Secondly, since making my decision at the end of last year, a possible benefactor has emerged to provide a donation towards the re-provision of services, as the hon. Gentleman said. That was discussed locally, but initially no consensus could be reached on what form alternatives might take—the health authority listened carefully to the benefactor's views, but declined the offer. Since then, the health authority and representatives of the benefactor have had further discussions to establish whether a donation could be used to augment the proposed NHS in-patient provision.

Irrespective of whether charitable funding is available, the hon. Gentleman should be reassured that the people of Oxted will continue to have access to high-quality NHS-funded health care. I know that negotiations are progressing in, I hope, the spirit of co-operation that we are striving to encourage in the NHS. The best solution for people in the area is for local agreement to be reached about the future of their local services. I cannot say when the negotiations will finish, as I am not party to them.

The hon. Gentleman's first question concerned the financial background. I do not have the information with me, so I hope that, as he suggested, he will allow me to write to him on that. I know the concern that has been expressed locally, and I shall be happy to address that directly.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman is reassured by the fact that the implementation plan that is now in place will result in new in-patient, out-patient and therapy facilities, as well as a minor injuries service, being available in Oxted by the summer of 2001. The time scale and detail of the re-provision depend crucially, as he rightly said, on the planning decisions taken by Tandridge district council. The local authority will no doubt be mindful of the need for a rapid decision to allay the concerns of local people about the future of health services in the town, and I hope that it has listened to what both the hon. Gentleman and I have said today.

I have had a significant number of representations about the matter, and I stress that the final form of the re-provision—which depends on a number of factors that I have outlined; the hon. Gentleman knows the background to them—will be for local people and organisations to agree, albeit within the caveats that I set out in my approval of the plan. I shall not be revisiting my original decision, which I expect to be implemented in full.

[Mr. Alan Milburn]

I assure the hon. Gentleman that the South Thames regional office will be responsible for ensuring that the detail of the scheme accords with the terms of my approval of the Oxted and Limpsfield hospital re-provision scheme. The regional office is keeping a close eye on the matter, and I am sure that officials there will be helpful in answering any of his detailed concerns. If he has further difficulties, I should be happy to deal with them personally, but I hope that I have been able to deal with the majority of the concerns that he has raised today.

Development Awareness

1. Mr. Hugh Bayley (City of York): What steps she is taking to inform the public about her Department's work. [46864]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. George Foulkes): As we made clear in our White Paper, the Government attach great importance to increasing development awareness in the United Kingdom. To that end, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have been visiting every corner of the country to publicise the commitments in the White Paper. My right hon. Friend will be in York next Wednesday. We are in the process of establishing our development forum, which will meet regionally and then nationally each year to discuss development strategy, and I am chairing the working group on development awareness so that we can strengthen our work in the field.

Mr. Bayley: In the wake of the pain of last night's football game, does my hon. Friend agree that the world would be a much better and safer place if people in this and other countries took as much interest in world development as they do in the world cup? Will he discuss with ministerial colleagues in the Department for Education and Employment the importance of getting a world studies strand in the school curriculum?

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): A Hearts supporter.

Mr. Foulkes: My hon. Friend is right to say that I support the team that won the Scottish cup this year. Although I am a Scotland supporter, I sympathise with all the England supporters over the tragedy that took place last night.

A great deal is being done to ensure that development studies are included in the curriculum. I have an A-level geography examination paper from the London examination board, which includes questions about development. We have had discussions with the Department for Education and Employment about giving development a higher profile, and some members of our development awareness working group, including myself, had a meeting with Professor Bernard Crick, who chairs the working party on citizenship, to discuss including global citizenship in the curriculum. I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that we are already doing a great deal.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon): Does the Minister recall his party's manifesto promise that, in government, Labour would increase the aid budget, and will he tell the British people why, in the first 12 months of the Labour Government, according to figures from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the United Kingdom aid budget has been cut by 2.2 per cent?

Mr. Foulkes: Let me make it clear that I remember all our manifesto commitments, each of which we are implementing. This year, we have doubled the budget for development awareness. When the comprehensive spending review is published, the hon. Gentleman will know exactly what we intend to spend on international development, and it will be clear to the British public and to the Opposition that we will spend a great deal more over the next few years than the previous Government did.

Mr. Streeter: The Minister has not answered the question. The Government have been in power for 14 months and have presided over a cut in the UK aid budget. They found extra money for schools and hospitals; why have they not found extra money for the aid budget? Is this not yet another new Labour broken promise?

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Gentleman is talking about the calendar year 1997, half of which was under the previous Government. That Government inherited an aid budget of 0.51 per cent. of gross national product and rising; it left us with 0.27 per cent. and falling. We are committed to turning that round in the course of this Parliament.

Mr. Streeter: When?

Mr. Foulkes: If the hon. Gentleman will have a little patience, he will see, when the comprehensive spending review is published, that the changes under Labour will start to reverse the decline.

Good Governance

2. Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): What steps her Department has taken to encourage stable and democratic government as part of its aid programme. [46865]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Clare Short): Good governance is essential to the achievement of sustainable economic growth, which is the only way to achieve a lasting reduction in poverty. It is clear from experience that conditions imposed on reluctant Governments in return for aid or loans tend to fail to secure reform, while Governments who are committed to poverty reduction use aid to invest in human development and economic progress. Good governance is therefore crucial to development, and it is the focus of much of our work. In 1997-98, we committed more than £70 million in efforts to promote good governance, including democratic reform.

Mr. Winterton: I thank the right hon. Lady for that reply. I presume that she agrees that good governance is an essential factor in the determination of which states are best able to tackle both poverty and debt repayment. Does she accept that multi-party government is another essential element in ensuring that we can achieve more through United Kingdom aid, and reduce poverty and deprivation in countries to which we give aid?

Clare Short: I entirely accept that, without good governance and the intention to promote poverty reduction and sustainable economic growth, no amount of conditionality or intervention will succeed. We need to back Governments who are determined to reduce poverty, and to introduce optimistic models. When Governments are not determined, we must find ways—for instance, through non-governmental organisations—to assist people who are suffering; but sustained development will not be possible in those countries.

In general, I agree with what the hon. Gentleman said about multi-party democracy. He may have had Uganda particularly in mind. I remind him that there is a commitment for the people of Uganda to decide in 2000 whether they want multi-partyism, or prefer to retain their present system of democracy. We say that that is for the people of Uganda, not us, to dictate; but the principles of democracy, and the ability to vote out a Government and local representatives, are key, and must be observed everywhere.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): As my right hon. Friend will know, the NGOs in Afghanistan have now been moved into very unsuitable accommodation, and the persecution of women in that country by the odious Taliban continues. What, if anything, can the international community, and those who—obviously—are still giving aid to the persecuted in Afghanistan, do in the way of sanctions, or making the Taliban behave humanely towards women and children?

Clare Short: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The Taliban has, for example, attempted to prevent women in difficult labour from going to hospital, because women are not allowed to go to the same hospitals as men. That is a fundamental issue of human rights: it is crude apartheid, and is causing enormous suffering. We are trying to get the international community to agree on an absolute precondition of equal treatment if any help is to be given, and the Red Cross has bravely stood by that. As long as everyone stands together, I think that we can secure that position, but it is a constant battle.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): Is not one of the best ways of ensuring democratic and stable government in many of those regimes—especially in the poorest countries—to ensure a proper reduction in debt, and the interest on debt? As chairman of the all-party parliamentary campaign for Jubilee 2000, may I ask the Secretary of State to give earnest consideration to ensuring that that debt is reduced by 2000, and that we are not given answers that really come from the Treasury? The right hon. Lady has specific responsibilities; will she use them to the utmost effect?

Clare Short: I assure the hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and I are working together in absolute agreement. We are determined to secure more speedy implementation of the highly indebted poor countries initiative. I agree that countries that are saddled with massive unpayable debts are set up to fail, because they cannot secure the resources with which to promote education, health and other aspects of human development.

We are strongly committed to backing good government. As I told the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), a Government who commit themselves to poverty reduction and improving health and education should then have the opportunity to have their debt written down to sustainable development, so that they can succeed and make progress. We are committed to securing the fastest possible progress.

European Court (Freezing of Aid)

3. Barbara Follett (Stevenage): If she will make a statement on her Department's response to the European Court's freezing of some of the aid budget lines. [46866]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. George Foulkes): My Treasury colleagues, who lead on this issue, have upheld the previous Government's decision to challenge European Union spending that had no legal base. The United Kingdom did not object to any budget line for assistance to developing countries, but the EU Commission decided to suspend future grants for those lines, while also reviewing the implications of the court's judgment. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury agreed with the Commission and the European Parliament on 23 June that all new grants not disbarred by the judgment will proceed by mid-July.

Barbara Follett: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Will he do all that he can to ensure that such matters are resolved with the minimum of delay, particularly as regards budget lines relating to land mines and human rights? Will he also ensure that the European Parliament has some discretion over awarding sums to smaller bodies?

Mr. Foulkes: It was for that reason that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary had her meeting. She wanted to ensure that those budget lines were reinstated, and that the money should be spent as quickly as possible. My hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Barbara Follett) will agree that the Government are right to ensure that effective control of public expenditure is treated as importantly in the European Union as it is in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Townend (East Yorkshire): Have there been any proposals to freeze European or British aid to India and Pakistan on the basis that, as they can afford to develop nuclear weapons, they do not need aid?

Mr. Foulkes: We have given that point careful consideration. The Government have condemned the testing of nuclear weapons by India and Pakistan, but we are concerned that some of the poorest people in the world live in those two countries. We are working with non-governmental organisations, international organisations and state governments, as well as the two international Governments. Stopping our programmes would harm some of the poorest people in the world, and that is why we have decided to continue with bilateral assistance.

EU Aid Programme (Accountability)

4. Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): What steps she will take to increase the accountability of the EU aid programme. [46868]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Clare Short): We worked during our presidency, which has just ended, to try to improve the effectiveness of European Union development assistance; Austria also intends to make that one of the priorities of its presidency. We are encouraged that DGVIII—the directorate responsible for development in the Lomé countries in Africa, the Caribbean and the Pacific—has plans for a programme of reform. We welcome the improvements that have been made, but it is clear that further improvements are needed.

Mrs. Gorman: I thank the right hon. Lady for that reply. In September, the European Union will reopen negotiations with third-world countries on aid. The right hon. Lady will be aware of the Court of Auditors' report on the appalling waste of money that has been put into the third world, involving awful cock-ups over the dumping of EU produce. For example, the EU provided more than £2 million to improve Namibia's meat production and abattoirs, so that Namibia could supply South Africa. However, the EU was also dumping subsidised European beef on South African markets at half the price that Namibia could manage. In another South African example, 2,500 jobs were lost in canning factories in the Capetown area because of the dumping of subsidised European fruit. Given the right hon. Lady's frugal reputation regarding waste, displayed in her famous remark about "golden elephants", can she assure the House that she will ensure that such waste of our public funds will not be allowed to continue during her stewardship?

Clare Short: The hon. Lady is absolutely right to say that the Court of Auditors has published damning reports on the performance of EU development assistance. She is also right on her wider question about the highly subsidised common agricultural policy and the dumping of food in ways that damage and undermine agricultural production in developing countries. We need reform of the CAP. The next World Trade Organisation round of talks on the general agreement on tariffs and trade will also consider agricultural subsidy.

The September negotiations on the Lomé mandate relate to trade and development assistance for countries in Africa, the Caribbean and the Pacific. I assure the hon. Lady that the principles of efficiency in development, supporting good government and encouraging trade and self-reliance will be key to those negotiations.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): In addition to questions of accountability in the EU's aid programme, there are serious questions about its administration. In the middle east recently, I heard representatives of non-governmental organisations complaining bitterly about cumbersome Brussels procedures for paying out desperately needed funds. Can my right hon. Friend do something to speed up those procedures?

Clare Short: My hon. Friend is right to say that the slowness is appalling. It is partly because of the exposure of misspent money which results in more and more checks being put into the system which becomes slower and more inefficient. That does not solve either problem. I assure him that we have made it a feature of our presidency to try to get improvements. We have secured some but there is much more to be done. We shall continue to work as hard as we can to get the biggest improvements that we can.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): I appreciate, and know of, the right hon. Lady's concern about accountability of European Union aid and I know that she has often spoken about it to the International Development Select Committee. I want to ask about the accountability and efficiency of European aid for AIDS in developing countries. She knows that one in four—sometimes a higher proportion—of the population in the Great Lakes region of Africa are suffering from the AIDS epidemic and are HIV positive. Over the past 10 years, the European Union has spent £160 million on various projects to do with AIDS but very little on an AIDS vaccine. The medical world believes that an AIDS vaccine is the only answer to the AIDS epidemic. Will she address the accountability of expenditure and do something about the EU encouraging research on an AIDS vaccine?

Clare Short: I cannot tell the hon. Lady without notice about EU spending on AIDS and an AIDS vaccine. I shall write to her. I agree that the evidence is clear that an AIDS vaccine should be possible. We have contributed to that, as have other countries. It is an important thing to do and the long-term answer, but there are other answers. Prevention is working. In Uganda, a national education programme has slowed the rise in AIDS. In Tanzania, we did research that showed that, if venereal disease were treated early, the spread of AIDS was slowed. A lot can be done on prevention, but we must back the vaccine as well.

Mr. Stephen Timms (East Ham): Given the encouragement of the recent prisoner releases in Nigeria, what prospect does my right hon. Friend see for normalising aid links between Nigeria and the EU, and, indeed, her Department?

Clare Short: My hon. Friend is right—there is a real opportunity in Nigeria. We must do all in our power to encourage the new Nigerian President to go for reform, democracy and proper protection of human rights. All of us are doing everything that we can to secure that aim. Up to now, aid spending has gone not through Government but through non-governmental organisations and local government. If Nigeria embraces reform, democracy and human rights, we shall be keen to work with the Nigerian Government to secure those reforms, which would be of enormous importance to the people of Nigeria and of the whole of Africa.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): On accountability, in response to my written question last week about the election in Togo, the Foreign Office deplored the harassment of election monitors, the confiscation of ballot boxes by the military, problems with the voter lists and polling cards and many other irregularities in the electoral process. In fact, it issued a declaration last month expressing concern. As Togo receives EU multilateral aid, would the Secretary of State say whether she also responded and what action, if any, she took during the presidency to attach conditions to the provision of aid to Togo?

Clare Short: I regret that I do not control EC spending on aid. I wish that I did, because I might then be able to bring about the improvements that the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) called for. Without notice, I cannot speak with any authority on EC programmes in Togo. I shall find out what has been spent and write to the hon. Lady.

Palestine

5. Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): If she will make a statement on the future budget of the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East. [46869]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. George Foulkes): Additional contributions announced recently, including an extra £1 million from the United Kingdom, substantially reduced the potential shortfall in funding for UNRWA's essential core budget this year. Donors have agreed with UNRWA to monitor the situation closely over the coming months, to support a process of financial and management reform in UNRWA and to work together to resolve longer-term funding problems.

Dr. Iddon: When a group of us visited a Palestinian refugee camp on the Gaza strip a few weeks ago, we detected a rise in tensions due to rumours that services might have to be cut because UNRWA had a £12 million budget deficit while the population of the camps had grown by almost 30 per cent. UNRWA is a stabilising force in the region. I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees with that. I congratulate the Government on increasing the budget by £2 million, but will my hon. Friend continue to apply the pressure on other donors at least to maintain the present situation, if not to increase the funding?

Mr. Foulkes: I was pleased to meet my hon. Friend and a number of our colleagues earlier this week to get a report on their visit. I was able to confirm to him and my colleagues, as I am able to confirm to the House, that we are fully committed to the work of UNRWA and the vital humanitarian role that it plays, but also to its reform and to making it more efficient. The United Kingdom has committed a total of £25 million to Palestine this year, including the Palestine Authority, and we are willing to consider what further we can do to help the people in Palestine.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): I warmly support the Minister's reply. Does he agree that there are opportunities for the know-how fund and the way in which it operates to be applied to the Palestinians, who have suffered such appalling treatment at the hands of the Israelis and are deeply deserving of our help?

Mr. Foulkes: What the hon. Gentleman says is wise. The know-how fund, as he knows, extends to the former Soviet Union and eastern Europe, but the methods are applicable elsewhere. We have considered helping Government institutions and the building up of capability in Palestine. I will certainly take further account of the recommendations and suggestions that the hon. Gentleman has made.

Sanctions

6. Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Pursuant to the answers of 10 December 1997, Official Report, column 615, and 16 March 1998, Official Report, column 454, what progress has been made in her plans to develop sanctions which hit elites rather than the mass of the people. [46870]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Clare Short): Work is being undertaken within Whitehall and we are working with other countries in the UN to ensure that future sanctions are as closely targeted as possible on offending regimes and that, when sanctions are agreed, appropriate humanitarian exemptions are included. I will, as I have promised, write to my hon. Friend when our review is complete.

Mr. Dalyell: Before there is another crisis in October or November in Iraq, will the Department and my right hon. Friend make inquiries about the behaviour of United Nations Special Commission personnel in Baghdad, information on which I have given to her Department?

Clare Short: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for informing me earlier today of the allegations about UNSCOM staff. I have checked with my officials, and we have no knowledge of any such behaviour, so I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would let me have as much information as he has. We will most certainly check it out. However, I have to say that the real answer to the suffering of the people of Iraq is for Saddam Hussein to cease manufacturing weapons of mass destruction. We must all do all that we can to bring that about as rapidly as we can.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Further to the hon. Gentleman's question, does the Secretary of State agree that, if a country's human rights record is bad, there is often a compelling case for shifting aid previously given to it to a neighbouring country in a similar income category in order conclusively to demonstrate that aid is linked to governance, respect for human rights and the concept of an ethical foreign policy?

Clare Short: I agree, as I said to the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), and we are keen to back Governments who have serious good intent to reduce poverty, which requires good governance, respect for human rights and successful models of development. When Governments do the right thing, they succeed, and the international community gets behind them. Then there is sustained and successful development. We cannot turn our back on people who live under bad Governments. We have to find other ways of bringing relief to them through non-governmental organisations, not through Governments. The hon. Gentleman is right. We must back good Governments and achieve success in development. In the other cases, we can bring relief, but we shall not achieve development where there is not good Governance.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I appreciate the concerns about looking after the poor. One of the arguments against the Jubilee 2000 campaign is that wiping out debt will increase the money for bad Governments, who will just take it. Are any steps being taken to mobilise world banking communities to watch out for money being invested in their banks that was sidetracked from aid by bad Governments?

Clare Short: The hon. Gentleman is right. There are conditions on debt relief in the HIPC initiative that Governments must have a good track record. That means that good Governments get debt relief and not bad Governments, who might spend the relief on more arms or more prestige projects. The hon. Gentleman is also right in that the OECD is calling for a great tightening up by all our Governments and institutions on corruption. It calls on all our Governments to make it an offence to offer a bribe overseas to a public official. Banks do not deal with corrupt regimes. We back successful Governments and freeze out the unsuccessful so that we get a better world order.

Peace Corps

7. Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): If she will assess the advantages of establishing a Government–sponsored peace corps of young people to assist with aid work. [46871]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. George Foulkes): We are encouraged by the numbers of young people who already take a great interest in development and we are seeking ways of engaging them further in development co-operation issues. However, developing countries require access to know-how rather than inexperienced volunteers. We provide such help through our own programmes and through our support for the four volunteer sending agencies, which have more 2,000 qualified volunteers overseas.

Mr. Mitchell: I hope that my hon. Friend will not rest satisfied with that answer but will look at the sustained success of the American peace corps, which every year sends abroad 6,500 young people with an average age of 29 to engage in English teaching, health, sanitation and development work in developing countries and even in eastern Europe. Could we not mobilise the commitment, enthusiasm and energy of our young people and perhaps even give them a remission on their student loans for going in exactly the same way and help developing countries at the same time?

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): There is VSO.

Mr. Foulkes: Voluntary Service Overseas, as the hon. Gentleman says, and the three other sending organisations already do that. I draw my hon. Friend's attention to another organisation, British Executive Service Overseas, BESO, which sends older, experienced volunteers overseas to offer their services. I am assured by the Government Chief Whip that, if my hon. Friend wishes to do that, he would not stand in his way.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): The Minister mentions four organisations that do much good work with young people. Can he ensure that publicity for those organisations is increased? Ultraframe, a private business in Clitheroe in my constituency, is investing much of its own money in providing food aid in Sudan. Many other private companies wish to assist in that way, and perhaps if we could get more links between business and charitable aid organisations such as the ones that the Minister mentions, more young people could be assisted to go abroad to help in aid projects.

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Gentleman makes a sensible suggestion. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I regularly meet the NGOs that are involved, and I specifically met the four volunteer sending organisations recently to discuss exactly the areas that the hon. Gentleman mentions, and also spoke about increasing the profile and participation of VSO and other voluntary service organisations.

Russia

8. Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North): What assistance her Department is providing to Russia in the current financial year. [46872]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Clare Short): The know-how fund is the primary source of the United Kingdom's help to Russia and the former Soviet bloc countries that are making the transition to democracy and a market economy. In Russia and elsewhere, the know-how fund has a good reputation for providing fast and flexible assistance in support of reform. Given the worrying continuing growth in poverty in Russia, greater emphasis in future will be placed on assistance for the social, environmental and governance aspects of reform.

Mr. Watts: I thank the Minister for that reply. I agree that a great deal of benefit has been derived from the use of the know-how fund in helping Russia to reform its economy. However, is it not time to focus all our help in that area on dealing with poverty and the environmental problems that face the Russian people?

Clare Short: I agree with my hon. Friend. Of course, dealing with poverty partly means having an efficient economy that generates the wealth to care for people. We shall continue that aspect of the work, but we are shifting the focus to social reform. Too many people are falling through the system and Russian men have lost nearly 10 years of life expectancy since the fall of the old system. We are about to publish our Russia country strategy paper and that will give details of the way in which we intend to make that change.

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): Will the right hon. Lady ensure that the aid and assistance to which she has just referred goes to the Russian people and does not end up being laundered by the Mafiosi, who are certainly part of the problem of the present Russian crisis?

Clare Short: The hon. Gentleman is right. The problems of corruption are great. The know-how fund does not go through Government; it goes direct to projects. It is tightly monitored and has a reputation for not getting embroiled in corruption in the way in which many other programmes do. Corruption is part of Russia's problem and it is hurting poor people in Russia.

Guatemala

9. Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): If she will make a statement on the Government's assistance to street children projects in Guatemala. [46873]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. George Foulkes): Although we have no direct development programme in Guatemala, we provide assistance for street children through the joint funding scheme that supports NGOs that work with street children, and through our contributions to the European Commission's programme.

Mr. Bruce: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that reply and remind him of the excellent work that my constituent Bruce Harris does with Casa Alianza in Guatemala. Will the hon. Gentleman's Department look particularly at indirect aid to try to get law and order sorted out in countries such as Guatemala, because street children are being persecuted by quasi-judicial organisations and people are not being punished by the courts there, and that causes even more problems?

Mr. Foulkes: We do financially support Casa Alianza and our contribution to the European Commission's programme is £23 million, a not insubstantial amount. We are working in Brazil, Ecuador, Kenya, India, South Africa and many other countries with street children. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that that is a significant contribution by the British Government.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [46894] Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 1 July.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others and will have further such meetings later today.

Mr. Hoyle: Will my right hon. Friend congratulate Royal Ordnance's land mine clearance unit, which is in my constituency, on its good work and on all the good work that it has done in Angola, Mozambique, Kuwait and many other countries, especially with today being the birthday of the late Princess Diana? Would that not be the golden opportunity for us to ratify the Ottawa convention as quickly as possible?

The Prime Minister: I am glad to pay tribute to the mine clearance team of Royal Ordnance, and I know that everyone in the House will agree with that. We have already achieved much in advance of ratification of the treaty. The export ban and moratorium on use were put in place within three weeks of taking office. The United Kingdom stockpiles have been destroyed—450,000 mines, almost half our stocks, have already been destroyed—and we have already announced the doubling of aid funding for de-mining activities overseas. However, I can announce today also that we intend to publish a Bill next week to ratify the convention and, if legislation is completed in July, as we wish it to be, we will be among the first 40 nations to ratify, as indeed we promised to do.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden): Will the Prime Minister overrule his Foreign Secretary and allow Foreign Office officials to answer questions from the Foreign Affairs Select Committee?

The Prime Minister: No. I think that the Foreign Secretary is entirely right.

Mr. Lilley: The Prime Minister may affect to be unconcerned by this, but it is not just the Opposition who are concerned. This morning, the Labour Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee said that the constitutional point is that "No Government should be able to set up a departmental inquiry and thereby hope to fend off any questioning."

Is not the truth that that is precisely what his Government are attempting to do?

The Prime Minister: No. I do not accept that that is what we are doing at all. The code of practice on access to Government information, which was published by the Conservative Government, says in respect of information that should remain confidential:

"information whose disclosure could prejudice . . . the proceedings of any tribunal, public inquiry or other formal investigations . . . whose disclosure is . . . likely to be addressed in the context of such proceedings."

Therefore, what we are doing is entirely in accordance with that code of practice and, as the inquiry is going to report within the next three or four weeks, I do not think that it is unreasonable to say that we should await its outcome.

Mr. Lilley: Is this not just another example of the contempt that the Government have for the House? Are they not a Government who make announcements outside the House, bypassing Parliament; who change the rules of Prime Minister's questions without consultation; and who now want to use inquiries behind closed doors to block scrutiny by Select Committees? Why is the Prime Minister riding roughshod over the unanimous opinion of 21 Chairmen of Select Committees? Is it not time that he listened to them and allowed Parliament to do its job?

The Prime Minister: No; and I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would have read out that question irrespective of the answer that I gave him—[Interruption.] I read out the reasons for our decision from the code of practice on access to Government information. I do not think that it is at all unreasonable to say that we should wait three or four weeks. Furthermore, the right hon. Gentleman will know that the Foreign Secretary offered to allow the Foreign Affairs Select Committee to look at the telegrams, provided that confidentiality was respected. That offer was turned down. In those circumstances, I do not think that the Foreign Secretary or the Government have acted unreasonably.

Mr. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): Will the Prime Minister comment on reports of the shooting of civilians by members of the Indonesian security services accompanying the British ambassador and European Union envoys on their recent visit to East Timor? What implications might the shootings have for future British and European policy towards Indonesia and East Timor?

The Prime Minister: We are pressing the Indonesian authorities to ensure that there is a full investigation of the incident. We obviously regret very much the death of the demonstrator. We have also said that we want to ensure that local leaders are involved fully in the investigation. The incident makes a search for a solution to the status of East Timor all the more urgent. Our ambassador, with his Austrian and Luxembourg counterparts, has just visited as part of the European Union troika visit. Moreover, the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), will shortly be meeting United Nations representatives in New York to re-emphasise our support for the UN process, which we hope will be successful.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Does the Prime Minister agree that the crisis in Kosovo has deepened dangerously in the past few days and now threatens to widen? Does he also agree that what is now needed is firm international action—which, despite the robust attitude of Britain and the United States, so far has not been forthcoming—and that, once again, the world is in danger of doing too little, too late?

The Prime Minister: I agree that that is a danger, which is precisely why we have been acting as we have. We hope that, over the next few days, there will be the right mixture of political and diplomatic initiatives. However, the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation continues to review all options for military action, which we have not ruled out. I go further than that and say that we are prepared to use those options should political and diplomatic efforts fail.

Mr. Ashdown: Reviewing all options is what the Prime Minister was doing two weeks ago—three weeks ago. The situation has now become much worse. Will the Prime Minister agree now to two actions: first, that the international community—if we are to regain control of the situation—should put down its own firm plans for a solution in Kosovo, based on Kosovo's autonomy within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; and, secondly, that, although a United Nations Security Council resolution on the use of force is of course desirable, the necessity of a resolution will depend on the urgency of the situation and circumstances on the ground?

The Prime Minister: In respect of the plan, that is exactly what we are considering. The right hon. Gentleman is right to say that, two weeks ago, I told him that we were reviewing all options. However, it is not as if nothing has happened between then and today. There have been intensive efforts—particularly by the United States, but also by Britain as president of the European Union—to find the right type of political and diplomatic initiative that works. Everyone understands that, if we use military action, it will be in a situation that is fraught with great danger and difficulty. As a matter of common sense, we must therefore make every effort we can to reach a political solution.

In respect of the second point, we shall of course ensure that we have a proper legal base for any action that we take. However, all options remain available to us. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the situation is getting worse—which is why political and diplomatic efforts have, if anything, been redoubled in the past few days. Nevertheless, I do not think that we are wise to act until those political and diplomatic efforts have been exhausted. However, as I said, all military options remain available, and we will not hesitate to use them if it is necessary to do so.

Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Will the Prime Minister join me in expressing concern about the extremely large bonuses that the directors of Yorkshire Water have recently awarded themselves? Does he agree that they and the regulators have a public responsibility, which obviously goes wider than their first job of providing us all with a good, clean water supply?

The Prime Minister: They do have that responsibility, and I hope that they discharge it. One of the reasons why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry published her Green Paper "A Fair Deal for Consumers" was precisely the public concern about these very large bonuses and pay increases. We are all happy if these things are earned, but, particularly when monopoly services are involved, it is important that the interests of the consumer and the public genuinely come first.

Q2. [46895] Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Before the election, the Prime Minister said:

"The values of a Decent Society are the values of a strong family unit".

Does he believe that marriage is important for strong family units and, in particular, does he believe that the Government's tax and benefit policies have any role at all in promoting marriage?

The Prime Minister: I would answer yes to both those questions. Yes, I certainly believe that marriage is an important part of any stable, well-functioning society. It is precisely because we believe that and believe in the importance of family life that we are trying to introduce tax and benefit reforms that help it. In particular, it is one of the reasons why we believe, for example, in the working families tax credit, which helps low-income families, and in parental leave, which helps families juggle the responsibilities of work and family life. I only wish that the hon. Gentleman's party supported both those measures.

Q3. [46896] Mr. David Crausby (Bolton, North-East): In 1998, we celebrate two important political anniversaries. The first, of course, is that of the national health service, founded 50 years ago by a Labour Government. The second is that of value added tax, established 25 years ago by a Conservative Government. Will my right hon. Friend consider setting up a focus group to determine which of those events commands the most affection?

The Prime Minister: We have not yet received a request from the official Opposition for a celebration to mark the introduction of VAT, but we will give it a sympathetic hearing if such a request is made. Of course, it is precisely because we believe in a fairer tax system that one of the first acts of this Government, as promised, was to cut VAT on fuel.

Q4. [46897] Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): Whenever a paedophile ex-offender is found somewhere to be housed and is then hounded out of town by a lynch mob, there is a very grave danger that such a person will exercise his technical freedom and end up doing unspeakable things to children in someone else's backyard. My constituents in Rutland have shown admirable restraint since learning that they might have Robert Oliver in their midst.

This is not an easy decision for anyone, and I thank the Home Secretary and his Minister for the way in which they have handled this matter with me. I will not lead a lynch mob, whatever the personal or political cost to me, and nor would the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). However, does the Prime Minister accept that the tolerance and trust of my constituents are near breaking point? Will he give me an assurance that, if they do what many other people in this country would not do, and exercise their civic duty by taking this man, the institution, Wing Grange, into which he is put could then revert to its former use as a rehabilitation centre for low-risk offenders only?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the responsible attitude that he has taken in this matter and to his constituents for the restraint that they have shown. I fully understand, as do all hon. Members, the concern at the prospect of having a paedophile housed in the local community, especially in a rural area such as Rutland.

On the future role of Wing Grange, the essential point is that no released offenders will at any time be housed at Wing Grange or anywhere else if they present a risk to the public that cannot be contained. Such arrangements will be kept under constant review. Much depends on the response of the individuals concerned, but perhaps I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that, in any event, there is no question of groups of paedophiles being housed together at Wing Grange, nor of any one paedophile being housed there indefinitely. I can further assure him that Wing Grange will take only offenders whose risk can be properly managed there now and in future.

I thank the hon. Gentleman again for the attitude that he has taken. It is an immensely difficult situation because, wherever such people go, there is bound to be an outcry in the constituency concerned. The way in which the hon. Gentleman and his constituents have handled the matter does them great credit.

Mr. John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington): Has my right hon. Friend any last-minute appeal to those members of the Orange Order who are threatening to force their way along the Garvaghy road this weekend? If the march is part of an act of religious worship, surely the God they seek to worship would rather the march were in an isolated field than risk any further harm to a community that has endured so much.

The Prime Minister: This is obviously an extremely fraught situation. We shall do everything we can to bring it to a proper conclusion. Of course the rule of law must always be upheld. A whole series of procedures has to be gone through, but I very much hope that people on both sides can see that, in the new era that could happen in Northern Ireland, it is in their interests to make sure that it does and that all the problems and tensions are reduced so far as is humanly possible.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden): A week ago, the Prime Minister stood at the Dispatch Box and told the House that the number of English students applying to Scottish universities was up. Before tonight's debate on the subject, will he set the record straight and admit that what he said was the reverse of the truth?

The Prime Minister: I will set the record straight. The number of English applicants as a proportion of the total has indeed risen, and indeed the number of English entrants to Scottish universities is also set to rise, but it is true that, overall, for all Scottish education, there has been a fall.

Mr. Lilley: I asked the Prime Minister a straightforward question about the figures. Why could he not give a straightforward answer and admit that he was wrong? After all, the Prime Minister is not the Paymaster General. He cannot publish one figure in the official documents and then declare a different one to the House. Is it not time that he admitted that his policy has caused a decline and that what he said to the House last week was factually incorrect?

The Prime Minister: I have actually corrected what I said to the House last week, but what the right hon. Gentleman is saying—that the reason for the fall is the Government's policy—is wrong, because the actual proportion of English applicants to the total has risen, not fallen. If the right hon. Gentleman were right and the policy had caused a fall, one would expect the opposite to be the case, but it is not.

Mr. Lilley: The Prime Minister is reluctant to admit that he was misleading the House, but he got his facts wrong last week and he has got his policy wrong tonight. It is nonsense to make students from England, Wales and Northern Ireland applying to Scottish universities pay more in tuition fees than students from Germany, France and Spain. The universities have said that it is nonsense; the students have said that it is nonsense; all parties in the House have said that it is nonsense; the House of Lords has said that it is nonsense and the Prime Minister knows that the majority of Labour Members believe that it is nonsense. Is it not time that the Prime Minister was big enough to accept that he has made a mistake and change the policy before tonight's vote?

The Prime Minister: No. The reason for the policy, as I have explained several times, is that in Scotland there are normally four-year courses because students have highers rather than A-levels, so students go to university earlier. In England, courses are three years.

The right hon. Gentleman says that no one supports our policy. The Dearing committee recommendation was that Scottish students should not pay tuition fees in their fourth year at university because it is a different education system. If we did what the right hon. Gentleman and others want and granted four-year courses all the exemption from tuition fees, we would have to do that for the whole United Kingdom. The bill for that would be £27 million. That money would have to be taken out of higher education.

As a result of the changes that we are making in student finance, we shall get more students into university, we shall get more resources into front-line education and the cap on student numbers, which was introduced by the Conservative Government and means that no more than 30 per cent. of school leavers in the UK can ever go to university, can be lifted. That is why I accept that it is a tough and difficult decision, but it is the right one.

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East): Does my right hon. Friend recall that the Tories campaigned in support of poverty pay by fighting to try to stop the Government's National Minimum Wage Bill? Does he hope, as I do, that the Tories will, for once, stick to their principles, and at the next election we shall campaign on having brought in a minimum wage—

Madam Speaker: Order. I must remind the hon. Lady and the House that the Prime Minister is responsible only for his Government's policies, not for the activities of the Opposition. If she could rephrase her question in some way, of course I will hear it. I am sure that the Prime Minister is already forming an answer in which he will enunciate his responsibility in terms of policy on these matters.

Ms Griffiths, this is your first question at Prime Minister's Question Time. Could you rephrase it in some way so that it is about matters for which the Prime Minister is responsible?

Jane Griffiths: Thank you, Madam Speaker. I stand corrected.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that if the Conservative party—[Interruption.] Will my right hon. Friend confirm that our policy is to support the poorest workers in this country?

Madam Speaker: Well done, that girl. Well done.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right. The Government will continue to support the minimum wage. We look forward to hearing a position from the Conservative party.

Q5. [46898] Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester): Is the Prime Minister aware that his health advisory group has warned that, unless the number of medical students increases by about 1,000 a year, the national health service will be out of doctors by 2010? Is he concerned that the number of applications to study medicine is falling and that the number of doctors leaving the NHS is rising? What will he do about that?

The Prime Minister: That is precisely one of the issues that is being addressed by the comprehensive spending review. We shall announce the results shortly. The hon. Gentleman will know that medical students are exempt from the new provisions on student finance. This is about how to get more resources into the national health service. We have got more money in already, but I agree that we need to do more. That is what we shall be announcing in the next few weeks.

Ms Margaret Moran (Luton, South): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating all those who signed an innovative leasing deal this week which will bring £170 million of private investment and 4,500 jobs to Luton airport? The deal will keep the airport in public ownership, despite all the efforts of the previous Government to privatise it. Will my right hon. Friend look for ways of extending such public-private finance arrangements to other areas of the public sector that desperately need investment? When he is next asked whether he has wafted in from paradise, as I am sure that he often is, will he be able to answer honestly, "No, Luton airport"?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted at the news that my hon. Friend has announced. I pay tribute to the work that she has done in promoting the deal. I believe that partnership between public and private sectors is far the best way to go for such institutions. It gives them a far better future than the dogma of privatisation on which the previous Government insisted.

Q6. [46899] Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): Will the Prime Minister find time to visit Kirkbymoorside in North Yorkshire to explain to the work force of Slingsby Aviation Ltd., many of whom have been made redundant this week, why the award-winning Firefly training aircraft, which is used by air forces throughout the world, including our own Royal Air Force and the United States of America air force, was not chosen to replace the aging Bulldog aircraft and lost out to an untried German alternative? We know that such decisions are not easy, but does he understand the anger of the local community, who question what sort of Government would put skilled British workers on the dole and export their jobs to Germany?

The Prime Minister: In respect of the last part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I simply point out that the Government whom he supported put rather a lot of skilled workers on the dole. The hon. Gentleman is right in saying that such decisions are difficult. They are taken on objective commercial advice; we have to try to get the best deal. I shall write to him and set out in detail the reasons for the decision.

I understand the concerns of the work force; of course we are worried about that. All such things were considered extremely carefully before the decision was made. We will do all that we can to help with the problems that the company is experiencing.

Ms Beverley Hughes (Stretford and Urmston): Is my right hon. Friend aware that Aneurin Bevan launched the national health service from the now Trafford general hospital in my constituency and that, 50 years on, on 5 July, another Labour Secretary of State will visit the hospital and help to celebrate that achievement? Will my right hon. Friend join me in thanking the staff at that hospital and throughout the NHS for helping to sustain the NHS during those years, particularly the past 18 years of attacks by previous Governments? Will he assure my constituents that this Government have a deep commitment to a modern, excellent health service, which is available freely to everyone?

The Prime Minister: It was the proudest achievement of the Labour Government after the war to found the national health service in the teeth of Conservative party opposition. It will be our job as a new Labour Government to rebuild the NHS by securing both the investment and the reforms that it needs, so that we get a better service, delivered at good value for money, and maintain the principle of the NHS, opposed by the Conservatives, which allows people access to high-quality care, irrespective of their wealth.

Q7. [46900] Sir Archie Hamilton (Epsom and Ewell): Why has the Prime Minister spent so much time trying to define the third way? Were not 18 years in opposition long enough for the Labour party to produce a new political philosophy?

The Prime Minister: Actually, we did that. In case the right hon. Gentleman did not notice, it was quite successful last May.

Q8. [46901] Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): The Prime Minister will know that, on 1 May last year, Burnley and towns throughout the country inherited major public and private sector housing problems as a result of 18 years of neglect by the previous Tory Government. The Labour Government have started to tackle those problems by allowing the use of capital receipts. What further steps do the Government propose to take to enable us to solve the problems and provide people with decent housing as we approach the 21st century?

The Prime Minister: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's work in this field. In defiance of the Conservatives, we have made available an extra £900 million through the release of capital receipts. More than 50,000 new social lettings have been created in 1998-99. However, we want to do more, because it is important to provide investment, particularly for some of the worst aspects of the inner city, where we need better modern housing, jobs, better schools and better hospitals. That is precisely why we have embarked on an investment programme that will allow all areas of our country to have the future that they need and deserve.

Q9. [46902] Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): Is the Prime Minister aware that, on Monday, a Dun and Bradstreet survey reported a 48 per cent. increase in the number of business failures in the eastern region of England compared to the last quarter? Does the Prime Minister understand that, while the Government sit complacently, the higher pound, higher interest rates and higher business taxes are hitting businesses and they are paying the price? He said that things could only get better, but they have got worse.

The Prime Minister: I do not accept that at all. We have made the decisions necessary to control inflation, which is important, and to get rid of the large budget deficit that we inherited from the previous Government. We made those decisions because, the last time a Government were confronted with such a situation—in the late 1980s and early 1990s—they failed to make the right decisions.

Mr. Lansley: Nonsense.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman says that it is nonsense, but in the early 1990s, we had interest rates of 15 per cent. and record numbers of repossessions, we lost 1 million manufacturing jobs and manufacturing output fell by 7 per cent. Those were the days of Tory boom and bust. That was the legacy of the Government whom the hon. Gentleman supported. We shall not go back to those days. People remember them. They know what the Conservative Government did, they know what that meant to our public services, and they will never repeat that mistake.

Dawson International (Redundancies)

3.31 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the 720 redundancies announced yesterday by Dawson International Ltd. and the Government's plans to support the economy of the central Borders.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Donald Dewar): I can well understand why the hon. Gentleman put down this private notice question. I have every sympathy with him and other hon. Members in the areas affected, and with their constituents. I recognise and understand the seriousness of the position. This is indeed bad news, although problems had been expected since Dawson announced its financial results some time ago. The news follows disappointing information about Viasystems, the printed circuit board manufacturers at Selkirk, where 200 redundancies were announced in May.

Although the unemployment rate in the Borders has been lower than that in the rest of Scotland for some years, there is no doubt that the Borders economy is heavily dependent on the textile industry, and these announcements have come as a particularly heavy blow.

I share the desire of many in the area to see the Borders economy diversify and modernise. The local enterprise company, Scottish Borders Enterprise, is at the heart of that effort, working with the local authority and other partners. Scottish Borders Enterprise has a budget of some £8.2 million in the current year, which, in per capita terms, is a comparatively generous allocation.

An extra £500,000 was added last year in recognition of problems in Hawick, which was appreciated in a tight and difficult year. The area was designated as a 5b area under European structural funds, with a programme worth around £21 million between 1994 and 1999. That makes it eligible for a whole range of grants to help to develop economic diversity.

I want to stress that the Government stand ready to play their part in further economic development plans for the area. My hon. Friend the Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office, has been discussing the situation in the Borders with the hon. Gentleman and others. He will visit the Borders tomorrow to continue those discussions with the economic development agencies, the local authority and, indeed, the public.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, my hon. Friend was especially anxious to have contact with the public, and he volunteered for what might be seen as quite a difficult engagement. He will listen carefully to what I hope and expect will be constructive proposals for the future of the Borders economy, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not expect me to anticipate that at the moment.

I cannot pretend to the hon. Gentleman or to the House that problems such as these can be solved overnight—indeed, it would be irresponsible to do so. However, my hon. Friend the Minister of State and the Government will respond positively in the course of discussions tomorrow, and ensure that the House is informed of any further developments.

Mr. Kirkwood: I am grateful for that answer. I acknowledge the work that has already been done by the Minister for Education and Industry, and we look forward to his visit tomorrow. However, does the Secretary of State understand that the scale of the redundancies—720 job losses, in contrast with what the Prime Minister has just been saying, in prime manufacturing, full-time, knitwear jobs—is a shock to the whole economy of south-east Scotland? The most recent estimate I have been able to get, with the assistance of the Library of the House of Commons, is that £6.5 million of purchasing power will be taken out of the central Borders economy, starting in August. That is a severe blow, which needs an urgent response.

The Minister for Education and Industry has been doing what he can, and we look forward to what might flow from his visit tomorrow, but it will take more than the Scottish Office Education and Industry Department to attend to this matter. Will the Secretary of State give the House an undertaking that he will involve local government Ministers and farming Ministers at the Scottish Office, and take a broader look at the whole Borders economy after the Minister for Education and Industry returns from his visit?

This is far and away the biggest economic blow that the region has suffered in living memory, and, if the Secretary of State does not take urgent steps to stem the haemorrhage of economic activity, the future for the Scottish Borders economy is extremely bleak indeed.

Mr. Dewar: I very much hope that the future is not bleak—I think that the Borders region has many advantages and many strengths, and we want to build on them. I entirely accept that the decision by Dawson's to shed 720 jobs is a real and significant blow. As the hon. Gentleman knows, 280 are in Berwick, but the whole area will suffer from this sad event.

The firm has major trading links with the far east, and perhaps some instability has resulted from that, but it is clear there have been long-standing problems in the textile industry of the Borders for some time. Ministers have talked to Mr. Finlay, the chairman of Dawson's, about the situation. We have made clear our anxiety to help if specific requests and proposals are made, although they would have to be considered on their merits. Dawson's still employs 1,500 people in the Borders, so it is still an important employer. Its redevelopment and restructuring, and its future success, are matters in which we all have a stake, and we have that very much in mind.

I accept that we have to look in a broad way at the problems of the area, and that that does not involve only one department of the Scottish Office. I have made it clear that we want to play our part, and implicit in that is that we are prepared to look in a broad sense at what strategic advances can be made and what can be done to help. However, it will not be a matter of an instant solution to what is a serious problem.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that concern about the redundancies is not confined to the Opposition Benches? I fully understand the deep concern felt within the Borders community and by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) about the devastating effect that the redundancies will have in the region.

Is my right hon. Friend aware that, only a few months ago, there were several hundred redundancies at the Wrangler jeans factory in Camelon in my constituency?

[Mr. Dennis Canavan]

There seems to be a common complaint in the textiles and clothing industries that part of the problem is the pound being too strong. Will my right hon. Friend have a word with the Chancellor of the Exchequer to try to bring about a situation in which the textile and clothing industries in Scotland can be more competitive?

Mr. Dewar: I accept that concern about the situation is widespread. I made it clear that it was shared by the Government, as I am sure it is by many of my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Benches behind me. I assure my hon. Friend that we take the matter seriously. Textiles is a particularly difficult sector at the moment. While other parts of the Scottish economy are doing well and flourishing, that sector certainly has its problems, which are not easy of solution, but we are prepared to consider anything that can be done.

On the pound, self-evidently a good deal of the increase in its value was completed more than a year ago, and, in fairness, a collapsing pound might be a more embarrassing problem than a strong one. For Scottish and, indeed, United Kingdom industry, above all we want stability, sustainable growth and low inflation. We want to ensure that we do not return to boom and bust and the stop-go cycles of the past. The Government are achieving all those aims to a fair measure, and they are important aspects of our economic policy.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): To understand the impact that the job losses will have in Hawick, Jedburgh, Galashiels and Selkirk, the House must understand how heavily reliant that area is on textiles. Also, it is worth noting that there are job losses on both sides of the border, and that any help will have to be on a United Kingdom-wide basis.

The greatest help that the Secretary of State could give, if he wants to help, would be to ask the Treasury to change its economic policy. We have an overvalued pound, rising interest rates, rising mortgage rates, a manufacturing recession, falling exports, a huge balance of payments deficit, and, now, rising unemployment. Are the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister living in some sort of economic wonderland—do they not understand the realities of what is going on out there? Under this Chancellor of the Exchequer and this Prime Minister, Labour is bad for business, and if the Secretary of State is correct and the Government are avoiding the boom and bust cycle, it is only because we are going to get the bust without the boom.

Mr. Dewar: That is a somewhat excitable summary from the Opposition—or I hope it is. Of course we recognise that there is a downside to the strong upside of stability and sustainable growth that we are trying to achieve. Dawson's has talked directly to the Treasury about the matter, and I think that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary met the company recently to discuss it, so the Treasury is well aware of those points. The hon. Gentleman's line was a convenient one to take, particularly in these unfortunate circumstances. I do not think that the views he has expressed would be shared widely throughout industry—certainly not in the form in which he put them.

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): First I must tell the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and the hundreds of men and women and their families who are facing redundancy that I am confident that they have the deep sympathy of the people of Dunfermline, where at one time 6,000 people were employed in the textile industry—now, it is only 120. As my hon. Friends will be aware, we have also lost thousands of jobs in other traditional industries in the past few years, and recently our hopes were dashed by Hyundai mothballing its development.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in such depressing circumstances, it is vital that all sections of the community work together, and that there is a strong public and private partnership at local and national level to overcome the problems and bring some hope to the community that things can improve?

Mr. Dewar: Of course I recognise that; it is a difficult situation, as I said. It is unusual, because the unemployment rate in the Borders is around or just under 4 per cent., so, superficially, it does not seem to be a particularly hard-hit area, but I recognise that the figures can be misleading. I mention that fact as a corrective against despair for the future.

I accept that all parts of the community must come together. I was, for totally unconnected reasons, in the Borders only a week or two ago, when I had the opportunity—very briefly—to meet some of the local political representatives and the local enterprise company. My Department has been in fairly constant touch with them over the past few worried weeks, and we want to play our part, as I said, and take account not only of a narrow spectrum of Borders opinion, but of the community as a whole.

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): I welcome the Secretary of State's acknowledgment of the problems in the Borders, especially as yesterday's hammer blow to the local economy follows a series of grim announcements in the past few months and years. He mentioned an increase in funding for the local enterprise company, but will he acknowledge that that merely reinstated the previous year's cut, which was imposed by the previous Administration? Does he accept that the low unemployment rate is a result of the fact that, when there are so few opportunities for other jobs, people leave—they do not hang around to be unemployed in the Borders?

Does the Secretary of State seriously believe that the Government's economic policy, particularly on the exchange rate—I welcome the fact that the Economic Secretary to the Treasury is in the Chamber—is sustainable? If Government policy does not change, there will be more job losses, not only in the knitwear industry but across Scottish and, indeed, United Kingdom manufacturing.

Mr. Dewar: I understand the hon. Gentleman's points, and I do not want simply to repeat what I have said, but we believe that certainty and stability are extremely important, particularly for those who trade across exchange rates. We also believe that sustainable growth is a major prize, and that low inflation is enormously important not only to industry, but to the community as a whole. We would not follow our economic policy if we did not think it sustainable. I appreciate that, in almost all economic circumstances, there is likely to be a less easy outcome for some—a balance must always be struck.

The £8.2 million given to Scottish Borders Enterprise is not, in per capita terms—I accept that that is only one measurement—out of line with moneys given in the rest of Scotland; indeed, it is probably above average. As I mentioned, we tried—modestly—with the additional £500,000 to recognise some of the problems that had arisen in Hawick. We are not inflexible, but obviously our budget is not unlimited—we must be certain that we are responding to practical aims, and solutions to what we accept are general problems. If such practical solutions and ways forward are charted in the discussions that I know will take place, we shall certainly do what we can to respond to them.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The news is indeed desperate for the Scottish Borders and all surrounding areas. Will my right hon. Friend do everything to ensure that Dawson's and public agencies take all possible steps to look after the people who are facing redundancy, and their communities? Will he take this opportunity to comment on the conspicuous failure of the industry to develop, let alone maintain, the market for high-quality knitwear products? Will he urge all agencies to concentrate on whatever scope there is for developing the potential of the high-quality, high-skill sector of the Scottish textile industry?

Mr. Dewar: I have made it clear that the Scottish Office believes, as I certainly do, that there is a future for textiles. We accept that things are difficult, and that there have been pressures both at the top and, for rather different reasons, at the bottom of the market. I am conscious of the difficulties that Dawson's has suffered, as anyone who has read the financial pages recently will be. The company is attempting to restructure and to refocus. As it is, even after these events, a very important employer in the Borders, it is obviously in our interests that it should succeed—and be helped if at all possible—in doing so.

It is also important—I think that there is unanimity on this—that we look beyond the one sector facing these problems, and try to diversify and broaden the range of economic activity in the Borders. It may be a small beginning, but BT's upgrading of its infrastructure in the area will, I hope, pay dividends in the longer term. We must look for such developments on which we can build and from which, we hope, we can get back the rather broader base that we all want.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross): Does the Secretary of State recognise that the textile industry generally, and not only a particular company in the Borders, is facing a period not of stability, to which he would aspire, but of collapse, and that tens of thousands of jobs are threatened? People will take no comfort from reading today that the purchasers manufacturing index shows a record fall over two years. The Government's policy on exchange rates is widely considered to be a major contributory factor.

Will the Secretary of State exercise his influence in the Government to seek to rectify the problems that have arisen from their uncertainties about the future of sterling and its relation to the euro, and recognise that it was a mistake to put taxation on businesses instead of on consumers?

Mr. Dewar: I do not accept that analysis, and I would dispute many of the right hon. Gentleman's assumptions. I remind him that the latest exports survey from the Scottish Council for Development and Industry shows a slightly improved performance in the textile sector for the first quarter of this year, which does not encourage total doom and gloom about the industry's future, although I freely concede that there are substantial difficulties.

We need to pursue an economic policy that is in the interests of the economy as a whole. We must recognise that the textile industry, with its heavy connection with the far east, has had a particularly difficult time. That is why we are talking about diversification, and considering a way forward. The right hon. Gentleman's criticisms are not justified and will not hold water.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok): As one of only a couple of Labour Members who were born and brought up in the Borders, I urge my right hon. Friend to take into account the enormous cultural and social impact of the textile and knitwear industry on that part of Scotland. It is a matter not only of jobs but of the way in which the area identifies itself to the outside world.

The Borders area is a relatively threatened habitat in cultural and social terms. I would certainly not want it to become merely a commuter suburb of Edinburgh, so I hope that my right hon. Friend can not only bring in other jobs but try to preserve the cultural habitat that is the Scottish textile industry.

Mr. Dewar: I am not sure that people would appreciate the term "cultural habitat"—it sounds somewhat off-putting—but I accept entirely the point about the individual character of the Borders. Perhaps I should confess, although that may not be the right word, that, when I was younger, I lived for a period in the Borders, just outside Hawick—but I do not want to blame Hawick for anything—and I greatly appreciate the charm and the quality of life offered by the area. We are trying to ensure that there is an economic infrastructure to support the communities and allow them to flourish. I think that everyone in the House is united on that.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus): Has the Secretary of State read the latest Bank of Scotland survey of manufacturing and service industries, which shows that the problems experienced by Dawson International are being repeated throughout the 300 companies surveyed? What steps is he taking on interest rates and the strong pound, and to repair the damage done to the Borders and other regional economies?

Mr. Dewar: I have already tried to answer that question, but obviously not to the hon. Gentleman's satisfaction. It is important to have a stable economic framework within which industry and commerce can operate. Low inflation is certainly important, although there is a tendency for people to pick on one indicator and ignore all others, when there is often a trade-off for a change in policy.

[Mr. Dewar]

Sustainable growth is also important, to allow people to plan ahead, whether they are selling overseas or in the British market, which is so important to most industries in Scotland. It is not helpful to pick one indicator in isolation and say that we should change it, without concentrating on the overall pattern of the outcome of economic policy.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): All Labour Members sympathise with the constituents of Members from the Borders, especially those who now face the breadline. May I remind them, however, that no Labour Member has been able to avoid this kind of thing? Thousands of jobs have slipped away from Inverclyde, because of the decline of the shipbuilding industry. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is right: there are no easy and quick solutions. That is why we can do without excitable outbursts from the so-called official Opposition spokesman.

May I tell my right hon. Friend, however, that Scottish Enterprise—and, indeed, local enterprise companies—must do much more to help indigenous industries and companies to prosper? Inward investment is important, but let us try to look after our own companies and industries, and let us try to avoid the traditional Scottish response to employment—migration, to which the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) referred.

Mr. Dewar: I think I can assure my hon. Friend—I suspect that I can speak for Scottish Borders Enterprise as well—that that organisation is extremely anxious to encourage the growth of small businesses, and existing businesses, in the area. I mentioned its own funding; I also mentioned European structural funds under heading 5b, which have generated significant additional money in the Borders. All these matters will be considered, but we are particularly anxious to see growth and stability within our boundaries as a result of our own efforts.

It is a cliché in debates of this kind, but it is often forgotten, that small firms supply the mass of employment opportunities. I imagine that that is as true in the Borders as it is in other parts of Scotland. We give a good deal of thought to trying to give people there the impetus, and the confidence, that will allow them to pursue their trade and commerce successfully.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): As vice-chairman of the all-party parliamentary clothing and textile group, may I ask whether the Secretary of State is aware that Dawson International, and the clothing and textile industries, are strategic concerns that are important not just to the Borders and Scotland but to the United Kingdom as a whole? There is not always an alternative employer to put in their place if, because of unfair competition and the monetary policy that is being followed, they have to declare substantial redundancies and leave large sectors of manufacturing.

Does the Secretary of State accept that using monetary policy and interest rates affects the exchange rate? Does he accept that interest rates are themselves inflationary, and are making it more difficult for manufacturing industry not only to invest but to compete? Will he intercede with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and ask him to review the high interest rate policy that his Government are following? It is inflationary in itself, and seeks to defeat the very policy that he wants to succeed.

Mr. Dewar: In a sense, I cannot charge the hon. Gentleman with the sins of the last Government, whom he would probably have criticised with similar vigour.

Mr. Winterton: I did.

Mr. Dewar: I thought that the hon. Gentleman had. I thought that I had heard familiar tones from the past.

Let me repeat that these are economic policies in the round. It is important to get the balance right. The hon. Gentleman knows full well the Chancellor's policy, and the present arrangements for managing interest rates, which were widely welcomed when they were introduced.

Of course the textile industry is an important sector of our economy, particularly—and still—in the Borders; but all British industry must cope with the present interest rates and the present circumstances. The textile industry has problems, possibly because of its connections with the far east, but also, perhaps, because marketing has not been as effective at the higher end of the market as it has been in other areas. It is certainly disappointing to note the number of redundancies at Pringle's, for example. It is sad that it has not been possible for the management of an up-market and respected brand name, given its product range, to compete as effectively as it might have done.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Will the right hon. Gentleman reflect on what he has said? Anyone who reads Hansard will assume that the Government's policy is to have a stable pound at DM3 or above. I once ran an electronics factory in Galashiels, at which a skilled and brilliant Borders work force of textile workers were trained as electronics workers. At the rate of DM3 to the pound, the electronics industry cannot expand, and it is losing jobs. The additional 1,500 jobs at Dawson International will not be sustainable at that exchange rate.

Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the Chancellor of that situation? Will he please not ask the Chancellor for a stable pound, as manufacturers who want to go into the euro tell me that they want to go in at a rate of DM2.40 or DM2.60, but certainly not at DM3?

Mr. Dewar: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's point; it has been made about 15 times in the past half hour. It may not surprise the hon. Gentleman to know that the Chancellor is aware of that argument. I am happy to emphasise, although I do not know that it will help the hon. Gentleman, that we believe in stability. We also believe that the economy should be competitive, and that we should be in a position to earn enough revenue to generate profits to reinvest for a successful economy in future.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil) rose—

Madam Speaker: It is my impression that the hon. Gentleman came into the Chamber after the statement. Is that correct?

Mr. O'Neill: Yes, it is.

Madam Speaker: Then I am sorry, but I cannot call him.

Local Government (Consultation With Young People)

4.1 pm

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and Cleveland, East): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to give local authorities powers to consult with minors on the provision of, and budgetary strategies for, services designed to benefit minors.

In the modern age, change is constant and fast. New institutions are constantly created to ensure that decision making harmonises with the people's will. However, decisions directly relevant to one group who make up a large part of the United Kingdom's population are often made without meaningful consultation. Children, and young people below the age of 16, are not given the right to be consulted over many decisions. Most legislation is framed in what can be termed a "protectionist" mode. The position for the child is that protection is on hand, but his or her innate ability to express his or her views is not always recognised. That is the basis of the Children Act 1989, and it was the starting point for the United Nations convention on the rights of the child.

I am aware that these matters are often defined by statute law. Under such legislation, the powers given to others to act for minors are in the best interests of children, and my Bill does not seek to amend or alter those arrangements. However, vast areas of local authority spending and decision making profoundly affect the life styles of young people. I submit that those areas fall under that part of the UN convention that states:

"each child should be consulted when his or her life is to be affected by a decision".

These are broad issues, and I am indebted to the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), who initiated a debate on 9 June in which he called for a youth parliament. The hon. Gentleman made many salient points, including one on children's right to make their voices heard. He said that a youth parliament should "set its own agenda, centred on what the young wanted to discuss, not issues foisted on them by an older generation."—[Official Report, 9 June 1998; Vol. 313, c. 876-77.]

I concur totally. I hope that the apparent cross-party support for measures to involve the young in the setting of social policy will encourage Ministers to take these issues forward.

The hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent dealt only with national issues, but such an agenda could also be set for local matters, which affect young children immensely. It is not only education, spending on schools or the new opportunities for post-16 training that are emerging, but the type and format of leisure provision, road safety, and crime and the fear of crime. All those things affect the young boy or girl as much as, or more than, the voting adult.

In support of the Bill, I cite some original research carried out in my constituency by the Children's Society, in close co-operation with Redcar and Cleveland council and local schools. It took the form of a survey of children's attitudes to local services in a number of small ex-mining villages in the rural east of the borough. It was carried out last late last year by a small dedicated team of researchers.

The findings were graphic. The survey was striking for the maturity of the views expressed, and for the positive way in which local children wanted to make concrete suggestions for bettering their home environment. They pointed to the need to ensure that parks and open spaces were well managed and, perhaps more importantly, provided the right facilities for the right age group. In that context, it is interesting to note that article 31 of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child calls for the right to play space for children within the community.

The children highlighted the problem of vandalism and their fears about bullying. They considered road safety on routes to and from school: We must get that right if we are to cut unnecessary use of private cars in home-to-school transport. Children are often the group out on the street the most. Their knowledge and suggestions could be directly useful as a factor in cutting road accidents. They noted that land use planning decisions often affected them the most deeply. After all, they will have to live with the results of bad or inappropriate planning decisions far longer than anyone else.

The study found that children were sometimes baffled by local authority decisions. For example, the local authority had recently had to dismantle some play equipment for health and safety reasons. The decision was never explained to local users of the facilities. When they found out the reason, the information came second hand, often from adults who knew about the issue only at second or third hand.

The children interviewed saw that as a cloak of secrecy laid over matters important to them. Why do we not ask children for their views on leisure and infrastructure? We consult designers, engineers and architects when we consider public provision for new buildings or other public facilities, and we often involve adult users, so why not young people too? Such consultation could help to change adults' views about children.

We are too often subject to moral panic in considering children's attitudes. Each year, there seems to be more legislation that seeks to deal with children within the confines of discipline or the framework of the criminal law. At the age of 13, a child can be put into a secure unit; at 14, sentenced for a serious crime; at 16, be expected either directly to work for a living or to make serious preparation for a career. All those activities are the concerns of adults, but we expect young people below voting age to bear the brunt of their effects and personal impacts.

Of course we are concerned about children's rights, but we do precious little to ensure that they can be exercised within the ambit of the democratic process. I am pressing for something modest that can be done easily.

I want local authorities to be formally requested and empowered to consult local children through recognised channels about their annual budgetary plans, in much the same way as they are required to consult local business interests. That is an integral part of article 12 of the UN convention on the rights of the child. I would expect the consultation to be directed primarily at secondary school age children, but there is no reason why the views of younger children should not be sought.

That could be done through adults who have responsibility for them, such as primary school teaching staff. However, we must ensure that it is the children's voice that is heard, and that the role of intermediaries is limited to that of facilitators. In my area, there are youth councils which are independent of, but supported by, the local authorities and by schools and colleges. That network of youth councils needs to be extended to more meaningful discussions. With my Bill, we now have an opportunity to do that in more general areas of social expenditure and provision.

There are also broader and longer-term benefits to be gained. An increase in the active participation of young people in the democratic process and debate will ensure that room for structural conflict between young people and adults in society is reduced. The Bill will also increase the overall accountability of local authorities for the way in which expenditure decisions are made. Involving young people at an early stage will make them more conscious of the need to take greater responsibility for their environment, and help to build better citizens for tomorrow. I hope that the House will agree to give my Bill a Second Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Dr. Ashok Kumar, Fiona Mactaggart, Mr. Lindsay Hoyle, Mr. Alan Campbell, Dr. Ian Gibson, Ms Jackie Lawrence, Dr. Phyllis Starkey, Mr. Barry Sheerman, Mr. David Chidgey, Mr. Peter Luff, Mr. David Prior and Mr. Andrew Rowe.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (CONSULTATION WITH YOUNG PEOPLE)

Dr. Ashok Kumar accordingly presented a Bill to give local authorities powers to consult with minors on the provision of, and budgetary strategies for, services designed to benefit minors: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 3 July, and to be printed [Bill 218].

FINANCE (No. 2) BILL

Clause 7

RATES OF DUTIES AND REBATES

4.12 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): I beg to move amendment No. 48, in page 3, line 43, leave out £0.4499 and insert £0.4358'.

It was noted at the time of the Budget that the Government were using road fuel tax simply as a way of raising extra revenue without any genuine environmental reasons. To do that, they increased the annual escalator, or rate of increase, to at least 6 per cent. above the rate of inflation. By bringing forward the increases by the earlier dates of their Budgets, the Government have further added to the burdens on the motorist. The House of Commons Library has confirmed that at the present rate an extra £9 billion will be extracted from motorists over the life of the Parliament. That is over and above the inherited pattern of increases from the previous Government.

Most disturbing, the Government have singled out diesel for especially high increases. Diesel is the fuel of industry, so increasing the fuel tax in the way proposed is inflationary because the price of all goods is affected. It is also uncompetitive because it will widen the gap with the continent. It is anti-environmental because firms, especially small ones, will be less able to invest in new engines and fuel monitoring systems. After those two increases, which have already taken effect, under this Government, diesel in the United Kingdom is 70 per cent. more expensive than in the European Union on average. That gap is set to widen. The beneficiaries will be foreign haulage firms whose lorries will arrive in this country with cheap fuel in their tanks and take business from British haulage firms and jobs from British truck drivers. Another beneficiary will be the French Treasury, because British lorries travelling to the continent will fill their tanks with cheap French diesel.

The amendment cuts the increase to the rate that applied until the election. We want the Government to revert to the previous increase rate, so that the £9 billion hit on British motorists will disappear. The Government's policy is short-sighted, damaging to employment and bad for business, and we should like them, even at this late stage, to change it.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): I listened with interest to the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory). I, too, consulted the Library and was told that the financial implications of his amendment would be £180 million-plus a year, especially for 1999–2000—indexed, of course.

It is curious that the Conservatives again propose measures that they claim will be popular, but do not say where the money will come from to meet the loss to public revenue. The amendment would cut the price of diesel by 1.5p a litre, but the consequences for the public services of losing £180 million a year would be significant. The Conservatives do not say whether they would add that amount to public sector borrowing; whether they would increase taxes, such as income tax, to compensate; or whether they would cut vital public services, such as the health service or education.

Conservatives have not clarified their policy, but throughout proceedings on the Bill they have played the game of making rather profligate proposals that leave a black hole in the nation's finances, which so far totals about £5.9 billion. They have not said where that money is to come from. In the context of the amendment, it is important to note that the escalator principle was introduced by a Conservative Government, for environmental and anti-pollution reasons. The Government's measure may not have popular acclaim, but it probably has a degree of public acceptance because people appreciate why increases in the price of such fuels are necessary. They are to discourage excessive use of such fuels, to ensure that the tax base is protected and to force environmental concerns to the forefront of people's minds.

The Government's proposal is a responsible measure, which helps to protect the integrity of public finances. I urge the Government not to accept the amendment. As I said, there is a gaping black hole in the Opposition's proposals.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Dawn Primarolo): I urge hon. Members to reject the amendment. The Government's commitment to raise road fuel duties by 6 per cent. a year above inflation has been clearly stated. It is only by increasing rates that the United Kingdom can make a sufficient contribution to placing the environment at the core of the Government's objectives for the tax system and further discourage environmental pollution by road users. That includes hauliers as much as private motorists or other road users whose vehicles run on diesel.

I remind the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) of the damage from emissions from diesel, especially particulates. The Department of Health suggests that 8,000 deaths are triggered by particulates and that, nationally, road transport produces 26 per cent. of those particulates and 46 per cent. of nitrogen oxide. The figures are considerably higher in congested urban areas, where, as we know, the health consequences are all the greater.

Unlike the previous Government, this Government are taking a lead internationally in promoting action to reduce greenhouse gases. The duty increase on diesel is a feature of that. Right hon. and hon. Members will be aware, although the Opposition constantly want to try to forget it, that the United Kingdom has now agreed to its share of the European Union target following Kyoto. That represents a 12.5 per cent. cut in emissions. Hon. Members claim that they want to reach that target and honour that commitment, and then do everything that they can in the House to undermine and vote against the very measures that will deliver it. Of the six greenhouse gases, diesel is a significant contributor to emissions of carbon dioxide and oxides of nitrogen.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine): Does the hon. Lady recognise that there is concern that the Government's motivation is not so clear cut when it comes to the environment, given the damage that they are doing to the North sea oil industry that produces gas, which reduces carbon dioxide emissions, and their threat to gas generation in the electricity industry? Thus the Government's arguments that they are motivated by environmental policy tend to be thin. They seem to be motivated far more by the desire to raise money, as a Back-Bench Labour Member admitted earlier.

Dawn Primarolo: That demonstrates just how little the hon. Gentleman understands about the complexities of dealing with the carbon dioxide emission target and ensuring that we deliver national air quality targets, and ensuring that, in undertaking those activities, the Government have a balanced approach.

The amendment would effectively remove the duty differential between diesel and unleaded petrol. Conventional diesel has a greater energy and carbon content relative to petrol, which gives diesel a litre for litre duty advantage. The higher duty increase for diesel was put in place to offset that advantage and because diesel is worse than petrol in respect of particulate and nitrous oxide emissions.

Mr. Leslie: I should just like to ask my hon. Friend's opinion. A recent study was done in my constituency, where I have been recently advocating the completion of the Bingley relief road, because we are trying to achieve a reduction in pollutants and traffic emissions in town centre areas. One recent study showed that particulate levels were increasing at an exponential rate, particularly in areas of high congestion. If the amendment were passed, would not particulate levels be kept high, which would have significant consequences? Are there not great environmental benefits to her cause?

Dawn Primarolo: My hon. Friend is correct about the impact of the amendment and the likely increase in particulate emissions, but of course the Opposition are not bothered about that. They want only to say that they are interested in the environment. They do not want to pursue the policies that would deliver that.

The right hon. Member for Wells made the point that the proposal was damaging to the haulage industry, but he refuses to acknowledge the other measures that the Government have undertaken to assist the industry, including, in particular, concessions on vehicle excise duty of up to £500. He has refused also to acknowledge the Government's review of the current system for calculating vehicle excise duty rates for lorries; that, in this Budget, vehicle excise duty rates have again been frozen; that, overall, the Budget has cut the corporation tax rate for those businesses; and the introduction of quarterly payments for large companies, replacing advance corporation tax. The list goes on.

When the Government's proposal—with the Government's strategy—is seen in the round, it is clear that it is fair to the haulage industry, to the environment and to our constituents. I ask the House to reject amendment No. 48.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Clause 11

RATES OF GAMING DUTY

Dawn Primarolo: I beg to move amendment No. 19, in page 5, leave out lines 35 to 40 and insert—

'TABLE

| Part of gross gaming yield | Rate |
|---|---|
| The first £450,000 | 2½ per cent. |
| The next £1,000,000 | 12½ per cent. |
| The next £1,000,000 | 20 per cent. |
| The next £1,750,000 | 30 per cent. |
| The remainder | 40 per cent.' |

During an earlier debate on clause 11 on the Floor of the House, in response to points made by several hon. Members, particularly the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor), I undertook to re-examine the table in clause 11 and its specific impact on casinos outside London whose gross gaming yield was in the range of £5 million to £12 million annually. The hon. Gentleman said that the provision would have a damaging impact on casinos and cited the cases of casinos in his own constituency.

Government amendment No. 19 will replace the table in clause 11—which will substitute for the table of gaming duty rates in section 11(2) of the Finance Act 1997—introduce new 20 per cent. and 30 per cent. duty rate bands, and revise the gross gaming yield thresholds set out in clause 11.

I agreed to consider the matter further, and there have been discussions with the industry on how the objectives could be achieved. In the light of representations about the impact of the Budget changes on the casino industry, I have tabled the amendment. I should say that, unfortunately, the industry was itself unable to reach any consensus on the model that it would prefer. I suppose that I should not be surprised that a number of individual groups offered proposals that met their own objectives but not necessarily those of their competitors.

Government amendment No. 19 will reduce the burden on casinos that are within the £5 million to £12 million gross gaming duty range. The Government's amendment deals with the specific point that was raised and will significantly reduce the burden on casinos in that range. I ask the House to agree to the amendment.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks): Another day, another climbdown; we welcome it.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): From the Back Benches, I should like to pay tribute to the Minister for the detailed consideration that she gave to the case that we advanced, and to assure her that her detailed consideration and great understanding of the matter are greatly appreciated. I should like her to know that Back Benchers very much appreciate the Government amendment. It is greatly welcome in Southend-on-Sea, where we have many problems.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 47

GIFTS IN KIND FOR RELIEF IN POOR COUNTRIES

Amendments made: No. 1, in page 26, line 25, leave out from 'used' to end of line 26 and insert

'in a designated country or territory either for medical purposes or by an educational establishment in that country or territory.'

No. 2, in page 27, line 35, leave out 'and'.

No. 3, in page 27, line 37, at end insert

'and

"medical purposes" includes medical research and the promotion of health.'.—[Dawn Primarolo.]

Clause 51

CONVERTIBLE SHARES PROVIDED TO DIRECTORS AND EMPLOYEES

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Helen Liddell): I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 35, line 27, leave out 'or securities'.

This is a very simple amendment, the purpose of which is to remove from clause 51 two unnecessary words. Under the clause, employees who receive shares that subsequently convert to shares of another class pay income tax on the value of the new class of shares, less anything that they paid when they first received the shares. The amendment will simply ensure that employees who receive such shares are fairly taxed and closes a potential tax avoidance opportunity.

Convertible securities do not present the same problems and are therefore excluded from the scope of the clause. However, there is a reference to convertible shares or securities in one subsection of the clause. Although the reference to securities does not in any way change the effect of the clause, it might lead to some confusion. We have therefore decided to remove the two unnecessary words.

Amendment agreed to.

TAPER RELIEF FOR CGT

4.30 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I beg to move amendment No. 42, in page 108, line 40, at end insert—

'(4A) The total amount of taper relief which can be claimed in accordance with this section by any one taxpayer in any one tax year shall be limited to £5 million.'.

My colleagues, like the Conservative Members, initiated an extensive debate in Committee on the impact of the taper relief on capital gains tax—

Mr. Fallon: Where were you?

Mr. Bruce: I was ably represented by some extremely talented colleagues. I notice that the shadow Chancellor did not even put in an appearance, so I need no comments from Conservative Members.

There have been developments during the passage of the Bill which justify the amendment and with which the Government will need to deal. Even if the Government do not accept the amendment at this stage, their proposals, as they come into effect, will generate evidence that I suspect will make them wish to return to this matter in due course.

[Mr. Bruce]

It has been suggested that, whether it was the intention or not, the capital gains taper will substantially reduce the capital gains burden for many of the very richest people in business, while it will increase the tax burden on smaller business people. I find it quite extraordinary that a Labour Government are deliberately altering the balance of capital gains tax in a way that seriously hits small businesses and enables a large number of extremely rich people to escape the full burden of the tax. The evidence has not been put forward by the Liberal Democrats; a number of independent tax consultants have said that the people who will make the most money out of the measure are tax consultants and, that being the case, they welcome anything that makes the tax system more complex. They believe that it substantially lets off the hook some people in business who are making substantial profits on the basis of the accumulation of the paper value of their shareholding.

A case in point involves the partners of Goldman Sachs. It has been estimated that, under the Government's proposals, they could potentially realise an escape from capital gains tax valued at £500 million. That massive tax concession is being promoted by a Labour Government while, as my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) will wish to make clear, many small businesses will face an increased tax burden.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury will appreciate that the purpose of the amendment is perfectly reasonable: to put a limit on the amount by which anyone can secure relief in any one year.

Dawn Primarolo indicated dissent.

Mr. Bruce: When I see the Minister shaking her head, I am totally converted to the view that we are in the face of new Labour, which clearly believes that there should be no limit to the tax-free gain that people should be able to make. That differs greatly from the speeches that I heard from Labour Members during 14 of the 15 years that I have been in the House.

As it has been clearly identified by independent tax consultants that the Government proposals will allow many individuals substantial relief from capital gains tax, a limit of £5 million seems pretty generous. The amendment proposes that anyone who makes gains of £5 million in a year will benefit, and the relief will be ended only if the gains exceed £5 million in a year. That seems very reasonable, and most people would regard a £5 million tax gain as more than enough to keep them even for two years. Therefore, in the circumstances, I hope that the Government will respond constructively to a real concern that has been identified, which I would expect a Labour Government to balance with fairness and justice, taxing the rich according to their means and ensuring that the less well-off in business are given a fair return instead of an increased tax burden.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): The changes that the Government are introducing on taper relief for capital gains tax raise a number of questions, but one is particularly significant.

Hitherto, a gain of up to £250,000 by a small business man or woman would be completely exempt from capital gains tax. The Government's new proposals would bring into charge that small gain, so that an individual gaining £100,000 would pay £10,000 in tax and an individual gaining £50,000 would pay £5,000 in tax. Under the old rules, such an individual paid nothing. Let me ask the House to concentrate on an individual gaining £10 million. When the full taper relief comes into force in 10 years' time, that individual will pay £1 million in tax. Hitherto, under the rules that prevailed before this year's legislation, that individual would have paid £3.15 million in capital gains tax. Under the new Labour rules, the tax bill will be £1 million. I have one simple question for the Minister, and I am sure that many hon. Members also wish to know the answer: why do the Government propose to penalise the small business man or woman and give such a bonanza to the very wealthiest?

Dawn Primarolo: It is a shame that the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) was not able to be present in Committee to hear all the debates on the issue. It is also a shame that he seems to have forgotten that when we debated the issue in Committee of the whole House, the Conservatives moved an amendment that would have taken the taper to zero over 10 years, which would mean that after 10 years a gain would be untaxed. The Liberal Democrats voted to a person for that amendment. After that substantial debate—

Mr. Burnett: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: No, I shall not give way. The hon. Gentleman will have plenty of time to explain to the House the apparent changes over such a short period in the Liberal Democrats' attitude—if we are not to assume that they are driven by opportunism rather than principled policy.

After the Liberal Democrats had voted for the taper to go to zero, they moved an amendment that stated that they accepted the taper and the principles of the Government's reform, but they wanted the Government to delay the implementation of the reform for a year.

Mr. Burnett: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman until I have put my case to the House. He has spoken and he can put his case in his speaking time.

The Liberal Democrats misunderstood—or deliberately failed to understand—the purpose of the Government's reform, which is to encourage long-term investment and reward entrepreneurs, while ensuring that everybody pays a proportion of tax, just as the Liberal Democrats say should happen with income tax. The amendment is driven more by newspaper reports than by principles of how capital gains should be taxed.

The amendment is uncalled for and unnecessary. It would undermine the Government's principle that, regardless of gain, a proportion of tax will be paid. The Liberal Democrats have failed to understand the enormous incentives that the reforms give to entrepreneurial activity and growth. I suggest that the House votes against the amendment quickly and that we move on to the next debate.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: I appear to have touched a raw nerve. The fact that I was not present when the issue was debated in Committee is not relevant. I am perfectly capable of reading the transcripts, discussing with my colleagues what went on and determining the argument for the development of policy.

It is clear that even Labour Members were concerned about the implications of the changes and supported the argument—even if they did not vote for it—that there should have been consultation and that a year's delay for that consultation would have been sensible.

Dawn Primarolo: So the hon. Gentleman is in favour.

Mr. Bruce: Of course I am in favour of consultation on an issue of such major concern. It is well known that the Conservatives wanted the headlines for trying to abolish capital gains tax, but could not find a way of doing so without creating the most massive income tax loophole ever envisaged.

Experienced practitioners—it is not a question of newspaper reports—pointed out that the Government had not fully considered the implications of their proposals. The Financial Secretary is digging her heels in to save face because she is not prepared to acknowledge that, had the Government consulted, the proposals might have taken a different shape. As I said in my opening remarks, it is quite unbelievable that a Labour Government are defending the right of fat cats to benefit from a massive tax reduction.

Mr. Burnett rose—

Mr. Bruce: Does my hon. Friend want me to give way?

Mr. Burnett: No, I want to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order.

Mr. Bruce: I was only trying to help my hon. Friend to shorten the debate.

We have put forward a perfectly reasonable proposal that would help the Government out of a potential embarrassment, and we certainly intend to pursue it.

Mr. Burnett rose—

4.45 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member cannot speak again except by leave of the House. Is it the will of the House that the hon. Member speaks again? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I hear an objection. The hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) cannot address the House again. The only reason why his hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) was able to speak twice is that he moved the amendment and was therefore able to reply to the debate.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and negatived.

Order for Third Reading read.

4.53 pm

Dawn Primarolo: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This is the second Finance Bill of the Parliament. It continues the process, which the Labour Government started on their election in 1997, of modernising the British economy, with the objective of raising the sustainable rate of long-term growth and ensuring that everyone has a share in rising prosperity. The Bill implements the second Budget of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The aim of the Budget is to turn ambition into achievement, encourage work, promote enterprise and support families.

The Bill is all about a Government keeping their promises and, in it, we continue our manifesto pledges. We have kept our promise to hold the basic and top rates of income tax at their current rates, which is delivered in clause 25. We have kept our promise to cut value added tax on domestic fuel to 5 per cent., which was delivered in the first Finance Bill, and not to extend VAT to food, children's clothing, books, newspapers and public transport fares. We have kept our promise to examine the tax and benefits system and announced the working families tax credit. We have kept our promise to reduce VAT on energy-saving materials for those in receipt of grants through Government and local authority schemes.

The Bill has sent the Opposition into confusion, especially the Liberal Democrats who, at times during the Bill's passage, were changing their policy positions as we progressed through the day, let alone the week. In Standing Committee on the Bill, the Opposition voted for amendments that would have cost at least £7 billion; in addition to which, they voted for amendments to the Social Security Bill worth £1.5 billion. The shadow Chancellor's view is that but that is not a view we share. Which public services should be cut to make good the £8.5 billion? That is the question that the Opposition have to answer this evening. Which taxes would they increase? Would they prefer to create another debt mountain, like the previous Government?

"There is no moral content in voting for more public spending",

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): On the subject of confusion, as the Bill has progressed through the Commons, has the Financial Secretary detected any change in economic indicators, for example, the exchange rate and the impact in terms of job losses, the upturn in interest rates and the unemployment figures? Has she detected any change in economic conditions and, if so, what is to be the Government's response?

Dawn Primarolo: What I have detected at this late stage is that the hon. Gentleman has finally participated in our deliberations, having seen no trace of him during the many hours, weeks and months in which we have debated both the Budget and the Bill.

The Bill introduces a number of measures to encourage work and to make work pay. Our reforms of the national insurance system will remove barriers to work that have faced many people in the past and will encourage employment. The new deal will be extended to provide new employment opportunities to the long-term unemployed, partners of the unemployed, the long-term sick, the disabled and disadvantaged communities. The working families tax credit will be a major reform of the tax system—necessary because the labour market has changed almost beyond recognition in the past 20 or 30 years—giving women the opportunity to combine family commitments with paid employment.

Throughout the country, firms are reporting skills shortages. At the same time, there is a huge pool of unused talent and the Government intend to ensure that we use that talent. People who want to work will be able to do so; they will be helped to find jobs and to stay in the labour market. We are determined to give them the skills and opportunities that they need, which is something the previous Government failed pitifully to do. The working families tax credit and the reform of the national insurance system, together with our increased investment in education, training and skills, will begin to ensure that we have a labour market that meets the needs of the 21st century. Those measures, taken together, will make it easier for people to get into work, especially families with children; they are about giving people a future and giving them the hope that they want for that future.

Mr. Derek Twigg (Halton): I am pleased to hear what my hon. Friend has said. What does she think would have happened if Labour had not got in? What sort of future would those people have had?

Dawn Primarolo: I am sure that the Opposition can explain for themselves how they would have continued to fail to invest in skills and to preside over chaos in the tax system, particularly in regard to families with children, and how they would not have increased child benefit or ensured that young people have an opportunity to gain skills and jobs through the new deal. As we know, the Opposition opposed this Government's windfall tax.

Alongside all of that reform, the Government are promoting enterprise. We need to promote enterprise alongside labour market reform to create a dynamic business sector, which is an essential part of any economic policy. We have put in place a corporation tax regime to encourage long-term investment. We have the lowest rates ever and we are abolishing advance corporation tax. Business has widely welcomed those changes. We have cut the small business rate of corporation tax to 20 per cent. from next year. Both business corporation tax rates will be held at the new levels or lower for the lifetime of this Parliament—an undertaking that the previous Government never gave, which shows the confidence of this Government in their policy and in our firms.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe): Is my hon. Friend aware that during questions to the Chancellor this week, the shadow Chancellor said that he did not realise that the gap between Britain and Europe was widening on corporation tax? He thought that we were getting closer to Europe and becoming less competitive. Does it worry her that we do not have an Opposition who are in command of their portfolio?

Dawn Primarolo: I am sure that the shadow Chancellor will settle into his new position and will get up to speed on the relevant facts with regard to corporation tax.

The Government have also undertaken long-overdue reforms of the capital gains tax system to promote enterprise, reward risk-taking and encourage long-term investment in place of a culture of short-termism and expediency. The Bill introduces tapers, which will reduce CGT on business and non-business assets held over the longer period. The effective rate of capital gains tax will be 10 per cent. for business assets held for 10 years. It is right in principle that everyone should pay a share of tax on their gains.

Sir Robert Smith: Has the hon. Lady worked out the consequences of the Finance Bill, should the Government fail to control inflation? How much real tax will people pay, if one takes into account the inflation of assets?

Dawn Primarolo: If the hon. Gentleman had been able to hear all the deliberations through the long consideration of the Bill, he would realise that the prudent approach to the economy being taken by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will deliver stability, investment and the security and sustainable growth that the country badly needs.

The Bill also introduces the new university challenge fund—a public-private partnership to provide £50 million in venture capital to help turn good research into good business, which is badly needed in this country.

There will be a further boost to first-year capital allowances to help fund investment—remaining at 40 per cent., rather than 25 per cent., for a further year. That is another indication of the Government's determination to ensure that businesses can grow and that investment is created.

The Government have also invested in the environment. We are committed to an annual increase in road fuel duties of at least 6 per cent. in real terms, which is slightly more than the previous Government's commitment of 5 per cent. The increase will help us to keep our commitment to greenhouse gas targets, which are crucial in meeting our Kyoto obligations. We will be consulting soon on measures to graduate vehicle excise duty to encourage the use of less environmentally damaging cars. The reduction, under clause 16, of up to £500 in vehicle excise duty for lorries and buses that meet the new low-emission standards and the changes in duties on diesel duties and road fuel gases will help to reduce the impact of transport emissions on local air quality. That is a vastly important measure.

In addition to climate change and local air quality, we are dealing with land use and sustainable waste management. The landfill tax, which was introduced by the previous Government, was an important first step in environmental taxation. The increase in the standard rate from next year should encourage waste producers to reduce their waste and to seek more sustainable ways in which to deal with it.

The Budget was about fairness. We inherited from the previous Government a situation in which one child in three grew up in poverty—this Government are determined to tackle that. We targeted support where it was most needed—on families. From next April, child benefit for the oldest child will increase by £2.50 a week, with an equivalent increase for poorer families through the family premium of income support and jobseeker's allowance—that is the largest ever increase. The new child care tax credit will pay 70 per cent. of the costs of child care—up to £100 a week for one child, and £150 a week for two or more children. To help fund the package to support children, we have reduced the married couple's allowance from 15 per cent. to 10 per cent. from April 1999.

Fairness also means ensuring that people pay their proper share of tax. The Bill contains a number of anti-avoidance measures to close loopholes and to prevent abuse of the system. That is why we ensured that the foreign earnings deduction loophole was closed. The Government will continue to ensure fairness in the rates at which people pay their tax and that people pay what they are required to pay.

The Bill reforms inheritance tax to tighten up the rules on public access to inheritance tax-exempt assets. It is right in principle that exempt assets that are supposed to be open to the public are open to the public—that makes the system fairer.

We are encouraging savings as an essential part of our strategy. The Bill introduces the new individual savings accounts, which make it easier for people to save. Extending the savings habit to more people is absolutely essential.

The Bill reinforces our commitment to economic stability and to the promotion of enterprise. It shows our determination to modernise the tax and benefits system to make work pay. It is another step in delivering what we promised less than a year ago—long-term stability, with opportunity for the many, not only the few. The Bill is another milestone in the Labour Government's progress to those objectives, and I commend it to the House.

5.7 pm

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Finance Bill—all two volumes and 400 pages of it—is one long exercise in tax raising, and Conservative Members make no apologies for having voted against its tax-raising measures.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): The right hon. Gentleman talks about tax-raising measures, but would not the amendments that the Opposition tabled in Committee have imposed another £6 billion to £7 billion in taxes?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Gentleman cannot even understand his party's Bill. Although he was on the Standing Committee, he cannot have been alert—we voted and argued against the Labour Government's tax increases, which have already done so much damage to the economy. If he cannot understand the difference between taxation and expenditure, he should not have been on the Standing Committee.

Last year, the Government targeted savings in their tax measures, and we are already seeing the damage that that caused. In this Finance Bill, they have targeted businesses. All businesses, which we try to represent, will suffer from an increase in corporation tax and from other measures—such as the increases in stamp duty and in road vehicle duties—that will damage the competitiveness of British industry in the wider world and hit the employment market in the United Kingdom.

We have already had an economically illiterate intervention from the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer), who clearly cannot understand the difference between a nominal tax rate and the actual tax paid by businesses. If he does not believe me, perhaps he should read the Red Book, where the extra £2 billion from corporation tax advance payments is clearly set out.

Dr. Palmer: The shadow Chancellor, on one of his rare visits to the Chamber, said that the rates—not the total impact—of corporation tax and income tax were narrowing between Britain and other countries. That is the point that I was questioning.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Gentleman is wrong to say that my right hon. Friend is a rare visitor to the Chamber, but he will have noticed that the Chancellor makes no visits here at all, preferring to address the European Parliament rather than to defend his policies here. He prefers addressing media conferences organised by Mr. Rupert Murdoch to dealing here with the fiasco that his economic policies have created. In our term of office, we cut the rate of corporation tax from 52 per cent. to 33 per cent., and the Government are now raising the effective rate by £2 billion a year, as is clearly shown on page 18, line 8 of the Red Book, which I commend to the hon. Gentleman.

[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory]

As only one example of their mean-minded measures and regressive taxation, the Government have ended the arrangement whereby those working overseas do not have to pay United Kingdom tax if they are abroad for 365 days. That will hit, not the tax avoiders and big earners, but the ordinary workers—nurses, engineers, aid workers—who cannot time their absences so that they can become non-UK tax residents. [Interruption.] The Government should be ashamed of that regressive measure.

The Financial Secretary talked about child care measures, but they are not even in the Bill. The Bill will enact all the tax-raising measures, and we are still awaiting any of the benefits that are meant to flow from them.

The new capital gains tax system is a fiasco, and I predict that we will need a rewrite. The system is far too complicated, and probably unworkable, and it is already backfiring on the Government. In a mean-minded way, the Government have withdrawn the retirement relief that benefited small businesses and replaced it with a tapering system that will give each Goldman Sachs partner an extra £16 million. Those are new Labour's priorities.

We extracted one or two small concessions from the Government. Because of the opposition and arguments of Conservative Members, they climbed down on dividend tax credits for non-taxpayers; there is to be a gaming duty revision; and they signalled that they would in due course accept our proposals for the reform of stamp duty and of the corporation tax payments for businesses affected by seasonal variation.

Labour Members were entirely silent in Committee and virtually silent on Report. As always, it is the Conservative party that defends the rights of taxpayers and businesses. The concessions may have been minor, but they were significant.

The Budget confirmed all the broken pre-election promises of a Labour Government, and the electorate will not forget that. I invite my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against Third Reading.

5.13 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: There are some inherent unfairnesses in the Bill that the Government have not addressed. I give them credit for the fact that, on matters such as individual savings accounts and the tax credit for non-taxpayers, they have recognised the force of the arguments: they have changed the rules on ISAs and intend to amend the tax credit provisions as soon as they can find the right formula.

That is welcome, but the fact remains that the Bill contains provisions that grow out of an unbalanced economic policy. It was interesting to see that Labour Members simply did not believe that changes to the foreign earnings rules would hit people such as overseas aid workers. They will hit people from my constituency such as overseas construction workers and those in the oil and gas industry.

It may be arguable that the package should involve a payment of taxation but, as we all know, many such people are on two or three-year contracts that were entered into on the clear understanding that the relief was part of the deal. This is effectively retrospective taxation on those people, and the Government should have taken some account of that.

Sir Robert Smith: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Bruce: No, I have only a short time.

The Government failed to recognise that they have completely distorted the capital gains tax regime. Abolishing the 100 per cent. retirement relief will clearly hit hard the small business people, farmers and others for whom the business is effectively their pension. They will be clobbered by an increased tax rate while very high earners will get a massive tax bonanza. The tabloid headlines may be about the Rolling Stones, but they will be completely unaffected. They will make their own arrangements, thank you very much, but other people will not be able to do that.

Mr. Fallon: Those points were made in Committee.

Mr. Bruce: Those points were indeed ably made in Committee by Opposition Members, but it is important to summarise on Third Reading why we take the view that the Bill is flawed and unbalanced.

The fundamental problem with the Bill is that it is based on an economic policy that is not delivering the Government's stated objectives. We do not have a stable exchange rate, or if we do, it is stable at a very high rate. We have rising interest rates and inflation, and it looks as though unemployment may be on the turn.

The Bill imposes taxation on the hard-pressed business sector that should have been imposed on the consumer sector to take the heat out of the economy and deliver results on inflation.

For all those reasons we, too, will vote against Third Reading.

5.17 pm

Mr. Derek Twigg: For several weeks, we have had to listen to a lot of nonsense from Opposition Members, usually in the guise of insults to individuals about what we were doing or not doing in Committee, to cover their own inadequacies and incompetence in tackling the Bill.

I was on the previous Finance Bill Committee, and the performance of the Opposition was even worse this time, although, to be fair, there were one or two exceptions. The Opposition failed miserably to dent the Bill or the Government or to perform their task of opposition. For those who had to sit through the Committee, it was like Chinese torture, believe me.

The hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) played a significant role in Committee. We had a detailed debate about how the Bill would damage those who own pushing machines in the arcades of Littlehampton and Bognor. I did not know what pushing machines were, as pushers usually have a different connotation where I come from. I am not sure whether the machines should pay at a 2p or a 10p rate.

The hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton also made an interesting contribution concerning tax relief on private health insurance. He tried to tell us, at about 2 o'clock one morning, that we should prevent people from using hospitals in Littlehampton or Bognor because they ought to take out insurance. He said that all the tourists who go to the area should carry health insurance and not bother using the hospitals. There seems to be a moratorium on visitors to his constituency using hospitals, which seems rather a good way of attracting people in.

We heard an interesting speech from the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn), who told us that the average person in his constituency often went to local auctions with a £10,000 table or painting—

Mr. Leslie: Or a carriage clock.

Mr. Twigg: Yes, carriage clocks were also mentioned. That is normal behaviour for the hon. Gentleman's constituents. When we were discussing historic houses, the hon. Gentleman said that he opened his house every weekend to visitors, and that he thought that every other Member should do the same.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): It is clear that, although he spent so much time in the Committee, the hon. Gentleman heard hardly a word of what was said to him.

Mr. Twigg: If that is all that the hon. Gentleman wishes to say, I will continue my speech.

Points have been made about foreign earnings. The Opposition were concerned about the Rolling Stones. Indeed, a point of order was raised at the beginning of one of our debates about the damage that the Bill could do to them. They have shown no loyalty to the country, have they? But that is what we have heard from the Opposition.

Sir Robert Smith: The Rolling Stones are a classic example of the fact that the tax man does not hit the high payers. He hits people like my constituents, whose employment as contractors for the oil industry takes them all over the world. They have little other option, if they want to continue to support their families. The tax is applied unfairly to them.

Mr. Twigg: The hon. Gentleman should talk to Conservative Members. I was a member of the Standing Committee, and I remember the reference to the Rolling Stones.

It was often said that we were sitting on our hands and were not speaking, but it was the Opposition's role to speak against the Bill. It was for us to support it. Opposition Members have forgotten what their role is: they are not yet used to being in opposition. What Opposition Front Benchers said in response to questions was usually couched in the form of some result. It was suggested that some measures did not need to be debated on the Floor of the House. During the passage of the previous Finance Bill, the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) was involved in delegating a fair amount of legislation outside the Chamber. It seems that it was all right for the Conservative party to deal with legislation in that way, but it is not all right for us to do so. The right hon. Gentleman tried to twist the argument. In fact, the Opposition's performance was pretty lamentable. It is difficult to think of any Opposition arguments that made any sense.

This is a tremendous Budget, which has been widely welcomed. The Chancellor has done an excellent job. As we learned from a fax that was sent to a Labour Member by mistake, the new shadow Chancellor had to speak to a Back Bencher to learn about economic policy before he was able to make a speech. How many shadow Chancellors have the Opposition got through so far? I wonder how long the shadow Financial Secretary will be in place. Perhaps he will be the next to move on, or perhaps it will be one of the other Front-Bench spokesmen.

We are not sure who decides the Opposition's economic policy. We do not know whether the Euro-sceptics agree with the Europhiles. Economic policy seems to be all over the place. But this Budget, and this Finance Bill, set the scene for a shift of resources from the better off to the least well off. There have been many other important developments. As was announced yesterday, a massive amount has been injected into the national health service to cut waiting lists, and money has also been provided to reduce class sizes. Lower taxes are being imposed on businesses: the Government are backing small firms to create jobs. Unlike the Opposition, we have thought in terms of long-term stability and investment, rather than boom-and-bust economics. Their approach to past Budgets has been characterised by short-termism. Having been through two recessions—and Black Wednesday—Opposition Members should not lecture us on economic competence. They made an appalling mess of the economy when they were in government, displaying their incompetence in a range of ways. We are having to pick up the pieces and clear up the mess that they made, which is shameful.

As was said earlier, many aspects of the Budget have not yet been mentioned, although they mean a good deal to ordinary people such as my constituents in Halton. They suffered massively from unemployment and poverty as a result of the last Government's policies. There are tax cuts for all employees who pay national insurance contributions; child benefit has been increased by £2.50 a week—£130 a year—which is the largest increase ever; and the Government have provided working families tax credit, child care tax credit and a cut in the business tax rate. The tax cuts for employees who pay national insurance contributions will give them more than £65 a year, and families with children will gain more than £250 a year.

A question was asked about families at Prime Minister's Question Time today: what has the Conservative party ever done for families? Nothing at all. This Budget does much more for them. The poorest 20 per cent. of families with children will gain an average of £500 a year. A family with a full-time worker will now be guaranteed take-home pay of £180 a week, and a couple with two children and an income below £17,000 a year will receive 70 per cent. of the maximum entitlement to child care costs. This Government care about families and will do something for them, unlike the Conservative party. Families earning up to £30,000 a year will benefit from child care tax credits. That is superb.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am not an expert on the Bill, but even I know—and the Financial Secretary confirmed it to me—that none of these measures is included in it. Is it in order for the hon. Gentleman to mention them on Third Reading?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is normal to have a reasonably wide debate on the Finance Bill.

Mr. Twigg: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Yesterday, you were generous to the right hon. Member for Wells, who, when we were discussing the narrow and specific issue of the retail industry, raised wide-ranging issues of economic policy. I accept your ruling entirely. The Conservatives are now complaining about us. The problem is that they do not like to hear what I am saying: it upsets them, because they realise that they have done nothing, that they are in disarray and that their economic policy is in a mess. They do not like hearing the good news that we have given the people of this country. I am surprised by the Opposition's reaction. It is typical of their reaction to the Finance Bill. I am sure you are glad that you did not have to sit through all the debates, Mr. Deputy Speaker; unfortunately, others did.

What upsets the Conservatives is that they could not cut corporation tax to the level that we achieved. In Committee, they came up with some spurious excuse for the fact that it had taken them 18 years to get the tax down to the level that they managed; but the point is that they did not reduce it to our level. They missed the opportunity, which is their problem.

The guaranteed income provided by working families tax credit is particularly important. It should be put in the proper economic context. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I keep hearing hon. Members saying that the hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg) is out of order. No one knows better than I do when someone is out of order, and the hon. Gentleman is not out of order.

Mr. Twigg: Opposition Members think that Labour Members are programmed to say certain things. It may surprise them that an awful lot of us actually agree with what the Government are doing. When I stood for Parliament on the basis of our manifesto, I supported that manifesto—unlike some who asked for help from various business men who are anti-Europe. We will not go into that, however. We are not sure what the Opposition support. Their economic policy is all over the place. Their spokespersons on education and on health say that not enough money is spent and there should be expenditure increases. Their Treasury spokesmen say that we should reduce expenditure, but they have produced initiatives that would cost £6 billion or £7 billion. They cannot say where the money would come from for that, which merely shows the economic incompetence that they displayed over 18 years. [Interruption.]

Perhaps national insurance reform is near enough the Finance Bill for Opposition Members. The burden is being reduced on employers in respect of most workers, who earn up to £440 a week. That is encouraging job creation. The Tories never encouraged job creation; they used to decimate employment. The current structure of national insurance contributions means that they bear particularly heavily on the low-paid, and we are trying to help them. Our policy is about getting people into work and making sure that they stay in it. [Interruption.] The Conservatives are not interested in the low-paid; poverty reached record levels when they were in power. Currently, £1 extra in weekly earnings can attract £1.28 in employee contributions. An extra 1p paid to a worker can add £6.30 to contributions. The system acts as a disincentive to both employers and employees.

Welfare to work is crucial to the Finance Bill. The Conservatives opposed the windfall tax on the utilities, but at the weekend we heard that Yorkshire Water would be paying its directors massive amounts of money. The Conservatives said that the windfall tax would cripple utilities, but they can still afford appalling massive pay increases for their directors.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): As he is a customer of Yorkshire Water, is the hon. Gentleman aware that the company has increased bills by 8 per cent. for those who do not have meters, which is well above inflation?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is certainly going wide of the Third Reading debate.

Mr. Twigg: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the whole economic system, how the utilities operate within it and the mess left by the Tories. Some of the Tories' chickens are coming home to roost, and we will have to deal with them. We have to pick up the mess. They expect us to do that in a year, but it took them 18 years, two recessions and Black Wednesday to make the mess. I do not want to repeat all that, but the Tories seem to forget it.

In Halton, where the unemployment rates for the young and the long-term unemployed are high—the demise of the chemical industry means that middle-aged men have problems finding jobs—the new deal for both the young and the over-25s will be very important. I have been to several meetings on the new deal for lone parents, and I have been told that the biggest disincentive to work for lone parents is child care. That message has come over clearly every time I have talked to a range of lone parents. Without exception, lone parents welcome the Government's initiative and the extra resources that we are providing.

Important points can be made about the new deal. We are giving help to employers, and introducing special measures for people over 50 and for partners of new dealers. All that is crucial to improving our economic development and economic growth.

Child benefits are another crucial part of our economic strategy. [Interruption.] They are about helping families. Children will gain an average £250 a year from the Budget. In 20 per cent. of the poorest households, children will gain an average £500 a year. Child benefits increases and equivalent increases in income support and other benefits will help all families with children who do not already receive a high rate of benefit. Poverty affects large families worst. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members, who remain seated, keep saying that the matters raised are not in the Budget. Perhaps I should refer them to "Erskine May" so that they may be clear on what is happening. "Erskine May" says that on Third Reading of the Finance Bill

"some degree of latitude is frequently permitted", although that is not allowed on Third Reading of other Bills.

Mr. Twigg: Your ruling and advice are, as usual, excellent and on the ball, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You rightly rebuked me yesterday, and you have made the point clear to the Opposition. They do not like to hear good news coming from Labour. They want to go on living in their own little world, away from reality. They are worried about their seats; in that case, they should support us.

Child benefit is important to millions of families in the United Kingdom. The Conservatives are saying that those families are not interested in having another £2.50. [Interruption.] That is what they seem to be saying; they do not want to hear the news of a welcome and popular measure. After the Chancellor made his Budget statement, my local newspaper, the Widnes and Runcorn Weekly News, an influential newspaper read by many people in my constituency, did a vox pop interview with several of my constituents. The only person who did not welcome the Budget was someone who was not from the constituency and who was just passing through. My constituents welcomed in particular our child benefit measures. On petrol duty, they understood what the Government were trying to do about improving the environment. The Budget was welcomed by almost all those interviewed in the street on that day. Those were cold interviews. I did not set them up. I was not even there. Ordinary people stopped in the street welcomed the Chancellor's excellent Budget.

Sometimes, I wonder whether the Conservatives ever talk to their constituents. They tell me that they have had hundreds of letters about measures in the Budget. That may be so, but I must tell them that I had precisely two letters on the Finance Bill. The Conservatives told us that we would be inundated, and claimed that we were sitting on letters and hiding them away. In the real world, that was not so. The hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton seemed to be the Member for the whole of Great Britain when he began to read letters from as far away as Yorkshire, Bristol and the south-east.

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): Dundee.

Mr. Twigg: I am not sure that he went as far as Scotland.

Mr. Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): Dudley.

Mr. Twigg: Dudley was mentioned. My hon. Friend figured large in the Standing Committee, where he made some excellent points.

To hear the Opposition, one would think that the people were rising from the streets in revolution, and banging on the gates of Parliament to tell us how disgraceful the Finance Bill was. I seem to have missed that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have been able to help the hon. Gentleman on a number of occasions during his speech, but the Opposition's behaviour has nothing to do with the Third Reading of the Finance Bill.

Mr. Twigg: I appreciate that advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I merely wanted to make it clear that our debates in Committee may have given a false idea of the real state of public opinion.

The Budget is about economic stability, low taxes on work, help with child care, lower taxes on business and more money for health and education. It is a people's Budget, which will help to ensure that our country is prosperous, and that our economy is based on sustainable investment which will allow it to grow.

5.38 pm

Mr. Salmond: The hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg) should know that complaining about politicians talking to anti-European business people might be interpreted as a grave sign of disloyalty to the Chancellor. In the environment created by new Labour, he should be careful about the allegations that he makes.

I was moved to speak by what I can only describe as the triviality of the Financial Secretary's response to serious questions on the economy. When she was a Labour Back Bencher, she used to ask the then Administration, and her Front-Bench colleagues, serious questions about the direction of our economic policy. To respond to questions about the Finance Bill on its Third Reading—which are basically about whether, as amended, it is capable of dealing with our economic circumstances—by engaging in a yah-boo discussion on whether the Liberal Democrat spokesman was present at a meeting of the Committee or who said what to whom in Committee is inadequate.

This afternoon, there was a private notice question on the extent of redundancies in the Borders in Scotland. The question mirrored announcements the length and breadth of the country as the industrial economy bleeds as a result of the exchange rate and the Government's total reliance on monetary policy as a means of demand management. The hon. Member for Halton seemed to think that there was a huge contrast between this Budget and economic policy over the past 20 years. I have been in the House long enough to have seen two previous occasions when the Government relied solely on monetary policy as the means of economic management. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) described a Tory Chancellor as a one-club golfer. We are in the same circumstances with the same reliance on the same policy instruments, and it will have the same result for the industrial economy.

The Government's mantra is that this will bring about economic stability. I suppose that an industrial desert could be described as stability, but is there no recognition among Labour Members of the importance of manufacturing, of the competitive position and of the seriousness of the announcements that are made daily about job after job in every area and sector of the economy? [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for

[Mr. Salmond]

Eastwood (Mr. Murphy) is so incapable of defending the Government's economic policy that he has to engage in economics of the actualité with youngsters on the "Trial By Night" programme, he should think carefully before appearing in debates in the House.

The bleeding of the industrial economy, the competitive position of United Kingdom manufacturing, the inability to use any policy instrument beyond monetary policy to control the economy, and the impact that that has in constituencies the length and breadth of the country are serious matters.

Mr. Burnett: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. Does he agree that, if taxes had been imposed on consumption a year or so ago, we would not have the problems that he is adumbrating to the House? I, too, have had a factory closure in my constituency. At lunchtime today, 49 jobs were lost at Inch's cider factory in Winkleigh.

Mr. Salmond: In the imbalance between taxes on consumption and between taxes on investment lies one of the key weaknesses in the Finance Bill. That imbalance, as well as the uncertainty over the Government's exchange rate policy and their approach to the single currency, contributes to the high level of sterling and the inability of key sectors of our economy to deal with the consequences of the exchange rate position.

The previous Conservative Government used to argue that the jobs that were being lost, the sectors that were disappearing and the companies that were being downsized were the weaker sections of the economy and that the UK economy would be leaner and fitter after the process was complete. It was the same as arguing that we could improve the average health of the population by getting rid of everyone who could not run a four-minute mile. That would certainly improve average health, but the resultant population would be small. The argument is now repeated by Labour Members, who say that the diminution of the industrial economy will result in a leaner, fitter, more competitive manufacturing sector. However, the key economies, which have grown their manufacturing base, have not taken the attitude that they can dispose of entire industries and companies; they have used critical growth path to build up their competitive position to compete on world markets.

The central charge against the Finance Bill and the Financial Secretary is that they are incapable of addressing the different positions of key sectors of the economy: the consumption and service sector side and the manufacturing and export sector side. Is there any measure in the Bill that accepts that there is a manufacturing recession while the consumer part of the economy is still moving ahead? What are the Government going to do about it?

There is also the charge that the Government, like their Conservative predecessors, are unable to lift their vision beyond the south of England economy and consider how the regional economies in England and the Scottish, Welsh and Northern Irish economies are performing. It is ludicrous to argue that Scotland needs to restrain demand because of inflationary pressures in the Scottish economy. Where are the inflationary pressures that the interest rate medicine in Scotland is designed to combat? As a modest start, it would help if the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank of England included in its membership some people with direct experience of the sectors and regions of England and the nations of Scotland and Wales, to give some awareness that there is an economy that is suffering beyond Potters Bar.

Mr. Douglas Alexander (Paisley, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Salmond: I shall not give way, and I shall tell the hon. Gentleman exactly why. There is more than a suspicion among Opposition Members that Labour Members are anxious not to move on to the next debate on student loans. I make no comment about House of Commons tactics, because I have used them myself, but the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not assist him in delaying an embarrassing debate on student finance which many Labour Members do not want. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should be allowed to make his contribution without interruption.

Mr. Salmond: The serious points raised have been totally unanswered by the Government. They are blind to the economic circumstances faced in the Renfrew-Paisley economy and in many other areas across Scotland. There is no recognition that there is a serious economic problem which mimics the economic disasters provoked by the Conservative Government over the past 20 years.

Mr. Alexander rose—

Mr. Salmond: This may be the new Labour party, but, for the manufacturing economy, it is the same old policy measures and the same old results: redundancies, downsizing and the diminution of the manufacturing base.

5.46 pm

Mr. Leslie: I am grateful for the opportunity to speak on Third Reading. It is a pity that I have to say this, but it is a shame that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), in his criticisms of Government policy and in seeking to bait the Government, was afraid to listen to the voice of the Government and to give way.

Mr. Alexander: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Leslie: I happily give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Alexander: Does my hon. Friend agree that the reason why the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) was frightened to give way might have been that, although he talked much about the service sector in Scotland, he did not mention the Scottish National party researcher who has recently recommended a boycott of a service sector company in the Edinburgh financial community?

Mr. Leslie: That is illuminating. Perhaps we will hear more about the SNP. As a Yorkshire Member, I would not wish to tread on the toes of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan, especially when he is not listening. The House looks forward to a contribution from my hon. Friend later.

The Finance Bill is a strong step forward on public sector finances and the economy. It ensures that provision is made for public services, that resources will be available to ensure they are of a standard befitting the 21st century, and that we can move forward into a climate in which Government and state services are high quality, accessible to many people, and provided at the most efficient and effective rate, giving good value to taxpayers.

Mr. Derek Twigg: I was taken by my hon. Friend's excellent comments on the public service ethic and his support for public service. In addition to this excellent Budget, does not the Chancellor's recent fiscal statement add extra strength and put down a marker to show how committed the Labour party is to public services?

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend is correct. I shall deal with "the code for fiscal stability" later in my remarks. It is important for us to set in context the fiscal situation that the country now faces. I am pleased to see that the nation's finances are now getting into a healthy state.

We are all familiar with the ridiculous profligacy of the previous Conservative Administration who, year after year, consumed taxpayers' resources. The leviathan of state swallowed up money in welfare budgets and social security payments unnecessarily, when we should have been using taxpayers' money to invest in infrastructure and job creation mechanisms to get people off benefit and into work. That would have reduced consumption of public sector resources, and enabled us to move on to other more productive public services.

Mr. Alexander: Can my hon. Friend give the House any explanation of why the previous Government were able to waste such huge levels of resources rather than investing in success?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not respond to his hon. Friend's invitation, which would take us well beyond the scope of this Third Reading debate.

Mr. Leslie: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not wish to stray from the matters before the House today.

It is important that, when we look at the context of the provisions in the many clauses of the Bill and the revenue effect that they have on the Exchequer, we should consider why it is necessary for the Government to start to change the direction of this great oil tanker of state and move away from the old consuming tactics of the previous Administration. Each unemployed person cost £9,000 in benefit and revenue lost to the Exchequer. If we can reduce the number of people unemployed and claiming benefit, and simultaneously reduce social security budgets, we can use the money for more productive elements, such as education and the health service. We can then make provision for better services over the long term.

The fiscal state of the nation is becoming very healthy, thanks to measures in the Budget and the prudent and careful measures drafted and proposed by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. I am especially glad that provisions in the Budget help to shift from consumption to investment and, more important, to capital infrastructure investment. For example, I should like to see some of the capital infrastructure moneys raised spent on an important scheme in my constituency. The Bingley relief road is an excellent scheme, and it would be very helpful. The new priority of shifting from consumption to investment will, I hope, one of these days mean that resources come the way of my constituency to improve the economy in that way.

We are making sure that we use the nation's finances for capital purposes as a priority. That is what is called the golden rule of borrowing. We do not borrow to consume, but use the nation's resources to invest in more productive things—obtaining assets for the nation and making sure that items of infrastructure can be used for industry and create economic prosperity in the longer term. That is the right course of action. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has set the ship of state on the right course, and I am pleased to support him.

The Budget and the Finance Bill contain many measures that modernise the tax and benefits system and begin to make work pay. I am pleased to see a number of fiscal policy measures put in place that give people the incentive and motivation to work and eliminate the poverty trap. It no longer makes sense for people to sit at home and claim benefit when there are opportunities for them to work and contribute to society. The Finance Bill plays a strong part in making those proposals a reality.

The Bill also helps to set the framework for economic stability throughout the country, ending the boom and bust years of Conservative administration. It is interesting to note the robust opposition to the Finance Bill put up this afternoon by the Conservatives. They seem to have given way and caved in so soon in the Third Reading debate. It is important to emphasise that boom and bust was not sustainable. It was the wrong policy for the Conservative Government to pursue. It is right for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to put in place measures to plan for the longer term. We no longer have an economy based on short-term greed and profiteering, which can sometimes arise in companies that do not always take the longer-term interests of the country into account.

When we discussed monetary policy and inflation earlier, we heard about the difficult impact that boardroom excesses of companies such as Yorkshire Water would have on inflation. The company paid a 30 per cent. increase to its directors and a 69 per cent. increase to Kevin Bond, the chief executive. That was an outrageous example to set the nation. I hope that Yorkshire Water will reconsider that payment, given the outrage across all walks of life and the boardrooms of this country. Boardrooms have to recognise that they have a responsibility to play their part in prudent economic policy and control of inflation.

Mr. Derek Twigg: There are many tax changes in the Bill. They are designed to encourage people into work and give them an incentive to work. How does my hon. Friend think that that fits with the point that he has just made about pay? Pay is important in ensuring that the measures in the Bill work to regenerate the economy.

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend is right. The Tories sought to remove the Finance Bill from the wider context of the other policy measures that the Government are taking, but those policies are an important component, and a crucial piece of the jigsaw in the Government's overall strategy. By ensuring that work pays by means of, for example, the national minimum wage and other such policies, and that the tax system reflects that strategy, the Government are pursuing the right policy.

Many of the provisions in the Bill relate to the national debt and public sector borrowing. On Report, the Opposition tabled amendments about the definition of national debt. It is important that we examine the state of the country's finances now and in the past, and consider where we would like to take them. The Conservative party left the country with a national debt of hundreds of billions of pounds. That is costing the taxpayer, year on year, £25 billion in interest payments alone. That money could and should be used on vital public services that people like, and on investment.

Mr. Jim Murphy: Has my hon. Friend noticed that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), the leader of the Scottish National party, who spoke directly before my hon. Friend, has chosen to leave the Chamber?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am having some difficulty understanding how that relates to the narrow discussion of the Third Reading of the Finance Bill.

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Alexander) said that they would allude directly to the comments of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan. He refused to give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South, and he has since left.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is nothing to do with the content of the debate. If there is any matter that is out of order, I hope that the Chair will be equal to it.

Mr. Leslie: I am grateful for that guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope later to deal with the points made by the absent Member for Banff and Buchan, and perhaps other hon. Members will do so.

I was talking about the national debt, and the £25 billion of interest charges that the taxpayers have to raise year on year just to stand still. That is a great weight and burden hanging around the neck of the public. That £25 billion could have been put to good use if the Conservative Government had not run up such debt by borrowing to finance their policies. They should have followed the policies that are in the Bill, and ought to have abided by a code for fiscal stability by which borrowing is used only to finance investment. From now on, the nation must practise good housekeeping: we must not borrow unnecessarily.

The Bill contains interesting clauses on income tax. I was a member of the Committee that examined the Bill and sat through many hours of Conservative comments and speeches. However, the Opposition did not table many amendments. Conspicuous by its absence was any mention by Conservatives that Labour has kept its promises on income tax, and has not increased the basic rate or the top rate. When people talk about Labour breaking its promises, we must remind them that that is nonsense. Many years ago, Conservatives raised the spectre of a Labour tax bombshell, but people can see from the Bill that a Labour Government can be trusted with the nation's finances. The Government have delivered on the crucial income tax component of Labour's manifesto.

I am glad to say that the Bill provides for a scheme that will greatly benefit the poorest countries in the third world. The scheme is called millennium gift aid. According to the Library, many hundreds of millions of extra aid will be channelled to the third world. In co-operation with the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, and, I think, the United Nations, a list of those countries has been prepared. We must make sure that we use not only monetary donations but donations in kind by the public and businesses to help those who are less fortunate than ourselves.

Mr. MacShane: In that context, does my hon. Friend agree that the country felt proud of a Chancellor who took the lead on the international financial stage? Does he also agree that that is in complete contrast to the mean and continuing cuts in overseas aid by the Conservative Government? The Chancellor's song resonated around the world, and at long last Britain could be proud.

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend is right: it was refreshing to read the Chancellor's comments in the Mauritius mandate. Through the millennium gift aid strategy and by other means, he took great steps to reduce the debt burden in third-world countries. I was pleased to note the Chancellor's generosity in the Bill. When we have the opportunity, we should shout about such achievements.

The Bill contains provisions for savings and investment. The Government are implementing strong policies to encourage saving and to make sure that we continue to provide generous tax relief to TESSAs and PEPs. That will be continued in a broader savings vehicle, the individual savings account, which will contain a wider variety of products.

Mr. Love: Does my hon. Friend agree that it was outrageous that, before Labour came to power, more than half our people had no savings, and that the previous Government did nothing to change that?

Mr. Leslie: That important point needs to be underlined. Encouragement for people to make pension provision has been lamentable. The Conservatives did nothing about that, and the spectre of unfunded pension liability grew year by year. They made no provision for people who had not been encouraged to save.

Thankfully, the Government's policies go a long way towards making savings more accessible, through a wider range of vehicles, and also more understandable. For example, there are welcome plans to make ISAs available in supermarkets and at other public interfaces. Ordinary people, not just those who can understand the fine print of TESSAs and PEPs, unit trusts and open-ended investment companies, will be able to save. It is a pity that there are not more OEICs.

Mr. Derek Twigg: My hon. Friend deals with an important part of the Bill. We have been accused of making U-turns. Does he agree that we engaged in extensive consultation on savings and listened to people, and that the Opposition criticised us for doing so?

Mr. Leslie: That is correct—you're damned if you do and damned if you don't. Many people are cynical about politics, and that arises from the fact that 18 years of so-called consultations were completely hollow. The previous Government made up their mind before they consulted. They went through the motions and engaged in a mechanistic process every other day. It is refreshing that this Government listen to responses, reflect on them and incorporate them in their policies. The principles of ISAs have been carried through, and the detail reflects the views of those who responded to consultation. The Bill goes a long way towards making ISAs a reality.

There has been discussion of inheritance tax and historic buildings. In Committee, Conservative Members sought in their old traditional way to defend the rights and privileges of the wealthy elite. They tabled amendments to preserve a loophole in the law that gave such people unnecessary benefits and denied the wider public access to objets d'art.

The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn), who is not in his place, spoke about his contribution to the nation's history. He asked hon. Members to consider what a great philanthropic soul he was. He said that he opened his house, and that letting people "traipse" through the drawing room showed that "one was egalitarian".

Mr. Deputy Speaker : Order. The hon. Gentleman is drifting.

Mr. Leslie: I may be drifting, but the point I was seeking to make was the lack of reality forthcoming from the Opposition during the debate on the Bill in Standing Committee.

Sir Robert Smith: While the hon. Gentleman is on that issue of the Bill, does he recognise that, while there might be concerns to tighten loopholes, any legislation must be careful not to be retrospective? If someone has entered into an agreement with the state to do something in return for a tax concession, to revisit it could be considered retrospective. The matter must be carefully considered, case by case and on its merits. We must ensure that abuses do not arise, but we must recognise that there are genuine individuals who have a contract with the state, which should not be abused.

Mr. Leslie rose—

Dr. Palmer: Will my hon. Friend give way on that point?

Mr. Leslie: May I pursue the line of argument?

This is not a private business agreement. This is the Government making decisions in the best interests of the overall economy. It is perfectly within the remit of the public sector and the Government to look at the varied effects of taxation, making sure that the best, most efficient and most effective deal can be got for the taxpayer. Clearly, throughout the passage of the Bill, the Liberal Democrats, making pledge after pledge and spending commitment after spending commitment, never understood that they needed to raise some money to subsidise their giveaway bonanza.

Dr. Palmer: Does not my hon. Friend agree that the Opposition are stretching the concept of retrospective taxation when they talk in those terms, because, on that basis, one could say that any Member of Parliament should be able to object if the taxation rate on the salary that we had been led to expect were to be different after a year or two? Surely that would be unreasonable. Any financial arrangement that one may make with one's employer is on the understanding that external events, such as inflation under a Conservative Government, higher taxation under the Conservative Government or other events in government or outside, could affect it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is abusing the terms of the Third Reading debate, wide though they may be. As he has only just come into the Chamber, perhaps he should take the temperature first. Mr. Christopher Leslie.

Mr. Leslie: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) speak for themselves, and strongly bat down the ridiculous comments of the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir R. Smith).

Sir Robert Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leslie: Well, just this once.

Sir Robert Smith: The hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) talked about events in the future, whereas I was talking about revisiting agreements that had already been entered into, where the state should tread carefully on the precedent that it sets on how it will behave in future. Agreements depend on both sides honouring them.

Mr. Leslie rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will revisit the Bill.

Mr. Leslie: The Bill did indeed tread carefully, as the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine suggests we should, in relation to this measure. It trod a steady course in ensuring that provisions were fair and equitable, in the spirit of the Government standing up for the many, not the few.

Mr. Love: I echo that sentiment. When the intervention took place, my hon. Friend was talking about conditional access agreements. Does he agree that those had fallen into disrepute, to such an extent that the signatories to the agreements did not need to make access available to the public? Therefore, any talk of retrospection is an argument against honourable change.

Mr. Leslie: Absolutely—an honourable change indeed. In fact, a Channel 4 programme, "The Mark Thomas Comedy Product", highlighted the abuse practised by some people exploiting this loophole in the law. The Bill has now tidied up the loophole. It is good to see yet again the Government responding to the concerns of a variety of people, including comedians.

I want to look at other clauses of the Bill, in particular other tax—

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Before my hon. Friend moves on from that point, we had an important discussion during the Committee stage of the Bill, and I want to pick up the challenge that the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir R. Smith) has issued on retrospection. Clearly it is one thing for parties to a contract unilaterally to change that contract. It is another thing for the Government of the day to say that they will give certain reliefs to people who engage in certain behaviour, but it is, of course, always open to Government to say that that relief, or relief in that form, will no longer be available—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is not an intervention on the speech by the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir R. Smith). It is the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) who is speaking at present. That is far too long. Mr. Christopher Leslie.

Mr. Leslie: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I think that the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) was enlightening and useful for me. I should be interested to hear his contribution later in the evening.

We have referred to the hon. Member for Guildford and his drawing rooms, and perhaps Fallon and his salons, but the clause that closes the loophole for heritage buildings, and other abuses on historic objets d'art throughout the country that enjoy tax relief, is an important measure that will be met with wide public acclaim—almost delight.

The foreign earnings deduction is one of the tax loopholes closed by the Bill. Throughout the Standing Committee, the Opposition made much play of the fact that somehow that is a great injustice. I cannot see how the deduction is fair for the good taxpayers of this country—the taxpayers who work day in, day out, paying their income tax and national insurance through pay-as-you-earn and other facilities. Why should they pay their taxes in full when so many people have the opportunity to exploit that deduction, by means of which they pay no tax in this country, and often no tax in the country where they work?

I cannot understand why the Opposition feel that this is a great rallying cry with which to go into the next election. We have a loophole whereby the super-rich have been exploiting the previous Government's wholly inadequate financial regulations by not paying any tax in this country. They remain residents, and are happy to call themselves British citizens, but they do not contribute to this country's public services. That is the important thing.

I do not mind paying my taxes. I can see the connection when I pay my tax, with the money going into the health service, schools, transport networks, and many other beneficial public services such as housing and social services. People need to recognise that it is not fair for those people to earn sometimes many millions of pounds yet pay no tax, so that the burden lies on the shoulders of the rest of us who live and work in this country.

Mr. Love: Does my hon. Friend agree that all the concern expressed by Opposition Members during discussion of this issue about charity workers and others whom they would consider to be badly paid employees working abroad, does not square well with the excess £80,000 limit? As that can be doubled over two tax years, people living in this country can earn more than £160,000 tax free.

Mr. Leslie: Indeed. I have made a point about the revenue that we can gain by closing the loophole—£300 million will be raised by closing that loophole alone. I ask hon. Members to reflect on the uses to which that sum might be put in their constituencies, and the public service benefit that could be gained by removing the exploitation made possible by that loophole.

Mr. Derek Twigg: My hon. Friend has so far made an excellent speech. The specific point that he was making was on the overseas foreign earnings deduction. Had the Opposition's amendments on the matter been passed without any explanation about where the revenue would be raised, would they not have created a black hole in the Finance Bill?

Mr. Leslie: That has been the central focus of my work on the Finance Bill. Although Opposition Members may have thought that Government Members were not speaking to the Bill as much as we should have done, I was taking very careful notes on every one of the amendments that they tabled, to determine the possible effect on the Exchequer's revenue if they got their way in the Bill. I shall deal with that point a little later in my speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should tell the hon. Gentleman that he may discuss only what is in the Bill, not what might have been in it.

Mr. Leslie: I am very grateful for that guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and shall ensure that I bear it very much in mind throughout my speech.

Mr. Jim Murphy: I have been listening with some interest to my hon. Friend. I wonder whether, in Committee, much consideration was given to some prominent individuals in the United Kingdom, such as Baron Vestey, who in one year paid only £10 on profits of £2.3 million? It is a very uncomfortable situation for a Baron in another place to be able to act in such a manner. May I encourage my hon. Friend to investigate—if not today, then in future consideration of financial regulations—that very issue?

Mr. Leslie: The issue is very important. Closing such loopholes and ending exploitation of tax regulations by the rich and their accountants—who manage to examine the small print in all financial regulations—has been a success of the Government's approach to the issue. It is a pity that the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) is not in the Chamber. My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) was very successful in comparing the accountancy profession with the bean-counting trade. Although I would never want to draw such a comparison, perhaps my hon. Friend will do so again later in this debate.

Although it is small, clause 116 demonstrates the Government's open-government attitude—which has itself ensured that, even in the hallowed halls of the Treasury and the Inland Revenue, Labour has been making provisions to fling open the doors, clear out the cobwebs and open up those institutions to the wider public, so that there can be better information about taxes and revenue.

Mr. Derek Twigg: It is the people's Treasury.

Mr. Leslie: Yes.

Clause 116 provides for people to claim tax relief from the Inland Revenue by telephone. Taxpayers across the country—including me—who are sometimes confused by their tax affairs, will now be able to pick up a telephone, speak to a friendly tax officer, explain their predicament, and, I hope, receive a very simple and common-sense solution. The facility will be available very shortly to most of the public.

A pilot study—which the Bill provides should begin in Scotland—of telephone claims will be conducted for the Inland Revenue.

Ms Helen Southworth (Warrington, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that enabling claims to be made by telephone is one of the many measures that the Government are considering and starting to implement to reduce the burden on industry and business, and that reducing that burden is very important to industry and business? Does it not also once again demonstrate that the Government are not only listening but taking action?

Mr. Leslie: That is right. One thing that businesses in my constituency complain about most to me is the endless number of hours they have to spend writing letters and filling forms, simply to run their business. Although we heard much from the previous Government about deregulation and cutting bureaucracy and red tape, they never did much about it. In a small but significant way, this Government are showing in clause 116 how we can cut red tape, and that, instead of having to write a letter, it is possible to pick up a telephone, call the Inland Revenue and begin to make a claim.

One reason for locating the pilot study call centres in Scotland is that the Scots have a friendly, trustworthy accent. Across the country, focus groups and opinion polls on developing call centres have shown that the Yorkshire accent is also considered to be a very trustworthy, prudent and commendable one. I suggest to Ministers that, if they want to extend the pilot study to other areas, they should perhaps consider locating one call centre in Yorkshire—perhaps in my own constituency of Shipley, where we have many Inland Revenue employees and very large Inland Revenue offices. A centre would be more than welcome, and I am sure that it would be a very successful venture.

The Finance Bill contained many other measures—not all of which I seek to speak to, of course. However, the provisions on landfill tax have to be mentioned. The tax was introduced by the previous Government, yet it has required some of this Government's attention. Recently, under the ten-minute rule, I introduced the Drinks Container (Redemption) Bill, which would reduce landfill across the country. I hope that that Bill is successful. However, I am pleased to see that the Finance Bill makes provision to ensure that landfill is not an easy option.

I have several quarries in my constituency—such as Manywells—that have been used for landfill, and have caused great concern to local residents. Currently, a planning application to establish another quarry in my constituency—at Buck Park quarry, in Denholme—is pending. Residents in Denholme—where I recently attended a residents' meeting—are very concerned that the site will be approved for landfill, simply because, as a nation, we throw away too much refuse and do not recycle as much as possible.

We should be encouraging people—actually providing them with incentives—to recycle, while simultaneously moving waste management strategy from use of landfill sites towards a better solution. I am pleased that the Bill makes such positive provisions to deal with landfill.

Mr. Love: Does my hon. Friend agree that, for the environmental reasons he has outlined, there is increasing resistance among our rural communities—which are represented mainly by Opposition Members—to increased use of landfill? Does he also agree that the landfill tax is one signal that the Government can use to try to deal with the problem?

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend is quite right. However, not many Opposition Members represent rural communities; Labour Members represent most of them. We are the ones who will have to consider those issues.

I conclude by contrasting the strategy chosen by Ministers in piloting the Finance Bill through the House with the amendments tabled and proposals made by the Opposition, and with the effects that those amendments and proposals would have on the nation's finances if they were ever to be implemented in future Finance Bills. I hope that they do not, which is why we need to give the Bill a Third Reading.

The Conservative party tabled many amendments, which involved a total of £5.9 billion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already told the hon. Gentleman what he can and cannot do, but he may just have forgotten.

Mr. Leslie: No, I had not forgotten, but I accept your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I was trying to contrast the Government's strategy as outlined in the Bill, which is to secure this country's financial and fiscal base and to make sure that sufficient revenues are raised and that fiscal tightening—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman further. On Second Reading it is possible to talk about what is not in the Bill as well as what is in it; on Third Reading it is permissible to talk only about what is in the Bill.

Mr. Leslie: Indeed. What is in the Bill is the strategy to secure the fiscal situation, a strategy that would not have been adopted by the Conservatives or the Liberal Democrats. The Liberal Democrat party proposed amendments that would have cost £17.5 billion, and the Conservative party's proposals totalled £5.9 billion. Both parties left a black hole in their budgets. We do not know where they thought they were going to get the money from, and how they were going to pay for their commitments. I hope that my hon. Friends will tackle that important matter.

[Mr. Leslie]

6.30 pm

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): I am sure that members of the public sitting in the Gallery will be astonished by this debate, as they may not be used to the filibustering tactics sometimes in evidence in the House. The hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) was clearly filibustering, although the occupant of the Chair did give some rulings about what is and what is not in order in a Third Reading debate. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have shown significant flexibility and tolerance to the hon. Members who have spoken so far.

I shall refer specifically to an issue that was not debated fully in Committee—partly, I understand, because of a misunderstanding between the Whips at a late hour. It could not be debated on Report, because the relevant amendment to which I would have liked to speak—amendment No. 43—could not be selected. It is a key issue that the Bill does not cover properly. It relates to the proposals on insurance premium tax.

The Bill contains some measures—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Amendment No. 43 was outside the scope of the Bill, which is why it was not selected. I have to tell the hon. Gentleman, just as I told the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie), that he must now talk principally about what is in the Bill. There is some latitude, but that is where the focus must be.

Mr. Davey: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That is why I want to raise the issue on Third Reading. The Bill tries to deal with what are called selective rates for insurance premium tax, but it does not do so properly. It is important that the House should recognise that, because the Bill's failings in this respect mean that the House should not give it a Third Reading.

The matter was brought to the attention of the House by the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Morgan) on 27 January. His points were not answered properly in that Adjournment debate, although he made them succinctly and they could have been dealt with more effectively.

For some time now, there has been disquiet about the effects of the higher rate of insurance premium tax introduced by the previous Government in the Finance Act 1997.

Mrs. Liddell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman is speaking about insurance premium tax. This afternoon, an amendment relating to IPT, which had been tabled by his colleagues, appeared on the amendment paper, yet at no point did they seek to move or speak to it. Is it appropriate for the hon. Gentleman to debate the matter now when he did not do so then?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair. I have already given a ruling to the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey), and I shall be listening carefully to see that he sticks to it.

Mr. Davey: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The higher rate was introduced to tackle alleged avoidance of value added tax in the form of "value shifting" on a few goods and services relating to the travel, domestic appliance and motor vehicle industries. Many people feel that the case for this particular anti-avoidance legislation, which is referred to in the Bill, was never properly made, and that at the very least the previous Government were taking a sledgehammer to crack a nut. As the Financial Secretary herself asked on 6 February 1997:

"Why have the Government taken a broad-brush approach that is likely to catch innocent commercial interests?"—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 6 February 1997; c. 177.]

Whether or not there was avoidance in the form of value shifting that needed to be tackled, there is no doubt about the damaging effect of the selective higher rate of insurance premium tax introduced by the previous Government. By distorting competition between direct insurers and retail companies that also provide insurance, it has hit several sectors very badly, not only hurting commercial concerns but reducing good consumer protection practices. Indeed, the Government admitted as much in the Budget, but with respect to the travel industry alone.

In clause 144 the Government have chosen to level up the rate of insurance premium tax for all travel insurance, recognising the distortion to trade that the selective rate had caused. My contention is that the Government should have considered the other sectors affected by this selective tax—the domestic appliance and motor vehicle sectors—using the same rationale that convinced the Financial Secretary to review the impact on the travel industry, as she has done in clause 144. I believe that European Union law may soon force the Government to address the problem, whether they like it or not.

Dawn Primarolo: If this issue is so important to Liberal Democrat Members, why were they not here this afternoon to move the relevant amendment?

Mr. Davey: As I have already explained, I was disappointed to learn that amendment No. 43 was out of order. That is why I am now raising the wider issues involved.

The recent victory of Lunn Poly against the original introduction of the selective premium tax is especially germane to my point. The European Court found that the higher rate of IPT was incompatible with Community law to the extent that it constituted state aid under article 92(1) of the relevant EC treaty, and that the United Kingdom Government had not notified the Commission of that as they were supposed to.

As the Financial Secretary told the Standing Committee, Customs and Excise is appealing against that decision. It asserts that it has no implications outside the travel industry, but many people outside the House do not share that opinion. Indeed, hon. Members may be interested to hear that the European Commission itself is not sure of the legality of the remaining selective rates. In answer to a question from the Liberal Democrat Member of the European Parliament, Graham Watson, Commissioner Monti said on 8 June:

"the Commission has been in contact with the British authorities and is still assessing the compatibility of a selective IPT with Article 92".

Although the Minister may not wish to comment in detail on the matter because it is sub judice, I hope that she will at least admit to the House that the European dimension is a factor that will have to be considered in any review of the remaining selective rates, in addition to issues of fair competition. It is to those issues that I now turn, as they are especially germane to the Bill.

When the Financial Secretary replied to the debate initiated by the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale on 27 January, she did not reply to a large number of the substantive points that he made about the effect of the tax on the electrical retail industry and the motor retail industry. She was expansive in respect of the travel industry, and we can perhaps now see why, but I should like to draw her attention and that of the House back to the other affected sectors.

The first is the electrical retail sector. There is a great deal of evidence to suggest that the value shifting that Customs and Excise suspects has been taking place in the sector has not been happening, and that the tax is therefore not necessary. Some of the evidence was cited by the Financial Secretary herself in a debate on the Finance Act 1997. Other evidence was put forward by the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale in his debate: he quoted the report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on the supply of domestic electrical goods, which is directly relevant, as it argues that, far from reducing the price of electrical retail goods, companies have been keeping prices artificially high.

The Government cannot have it both ways. Either prices are being kept low to avoid tax, with value being shifted on to related insurance policies to avoid VAT, or prices are being kept high, as the President of the Board of Trade seems to accept.

The Government collectively seem confused on the issue, but the result of that confusion as regards insurance premium tax is serious damage to United Kingdom companies in terms of lost business and lost jobs. Last year, the Financial Secretary herself cited the examples of Thorn and Granada, which, between them, have lost an estimated £20 million and around 800 jobs across the country.

Ironically, the compliance costs to the sector have been exceedingly high. High-street television rental companies were forced to write to all customers explaining the change and to produce new contracts for customers wishing to renew. That exercise cost around £1 million, and the firms lost business. As a result, many electrical products are now sold without insurance cover. That diminishes the protection to the consumer, who may or may not go to a direct insurer. Of course, direct insurers are keen to step into the breach and are marketing themselves strongly to gain the business. However, many consumers will not have the same protection as before.

The Association of British Insurers has issued a general information sheet encouraging customers to buy insurance from direct insurers, as opposed to one-stop shopping. It poses the following question:

"So how can I avoid paying the higher rate of IPT?"

The response makes clear the intentions of the industry:

"By not buying your insurance from the same place you buy your domestic appliance".

What greater evidence does Customs and Excise need of how the higher rates of insurance premium tax are distorting the market? What right does Customs and Excise have to do that? I hope that the Minister will examine the way in which officials looked at the case of the high-street electrical sector, as she was prepared to do for the travel industry. It has been unfair and almost vendetta-like.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that many people outside the House who listened to Labour in opposition might have expected more from this year's Finance Bill? Unfortunately, it is yet another example of Labour saying one thing in opposition and doing something else in government.

Mr. Davey: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. He makes a telling point. However, the Government deserve some credit, as they have made some progress on the travel industry. We should not be churlish, as we welcome that. Unfortunately, however, they have missed two major sectors, and that is causing great problems.

The second sector that the Government have failed to address is the motor vehicle retail sector, to which similar arguments about the problems of unfair competition and reduced consumer protection apply as a result of the failings of the Bill. I want to highlight consumer protection, as that aspect is particularly worrying.

As a result of its insurance policies attracting the higher rate of tax, as much as 50 per cent. of the motor vehicle retail industry has switched from issuing insurance policies to issuing warranties with its cars. The significance for consumer protection of that trend can best be appreciated if we examine the distinction between an insurance policy and a warranty. In essence, a warranty is an undertaking by the seller as to the condition of the property, and an undertaking that future deterioration of that condition will not arise. On the other hand, an insurance contract indemnifies the insured against loss or liability if and when such deterioration occurs. So the cover is different. A warranty is less attractive because it is not usually provided by a third party. If the seller goes broke, the warranty becomes useless. The consumer is protected only in so far as his or her supplier does not go bankrupt.

Dawn Primarolo: I am perplexed by the hon. Gentleman's concern about this subject. Will he say when he raised it in Committee and where were the relevant amendments? Third Reading is not the appropriate time to raise the issue. I do not remember his mentioning it in

[Dawn Primarolo]

Committee, and no amendment is mentioned in Hansard. Nor was the hon. Gentleman here to move his amendment earlier today.

Mr. Davey: The Financial Secretary may recall that the clause in question was debated very late at night when the Whips failed to make a proper agreement, so the argument remains germane and it is important that it is heard.

Dawn Primarolo: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the issue is extremely important to his party except when he needs sleep or cannot get here in time for a debate?

Mr. Davey: The Minister does not seem to want us to raise the matter, and that is unfortunate. She was happy to raise it when she was in opposition, but now that her party is in government she does not want to hear about it. The hypocrisy is on her side for not addressing the issues now that she is in power.

The move away from insurance policies to warranties by many motor vehicle retailers—driven by this selective rate of tax—is seriously reducing consumer protection in this country. If the Minister is concerned about the state of the country's finances, she ought to listen. The Exchequer may lose even more money than it did from any previous tax avoidance—if such avoidance was occurring—because of the shift to warranties which fall outside the tax base. How ludicrous it is to have an anti-avoidance measure that reduces the revenue to the Treasury and exposes the ordinary citizen to greater risk.

So what is the solution? I believe that levelling down to 4 per cent. is the best solution, mainly because I do not believe that there should be any selectivity in principle.

Mrs. Liddell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davey: I have given way several times and I am now coming to the end of my speech.

Mrs. Liddell rose—

Mr. Davey: I am not giving way—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot have barracking from the Government Benches. The hon. Gentleman is entitled to be heard.

Mr. Davey: I believe that levelling down would be the best approach and that, in practice, such a reduction, by ending the switch to warranties, would net more revenue for the Exchequer, for the reasons that I have outlined.

I hope that the Financial Secretary will address the points that I have raised. She seems to think that it was somehow illegitimate to raise them, but they are extremely important because they affect jobs and businesses outside the House. Whether the Government like it or not, they must address the issues, and I hope that they will have the courtesy to do so tonight.

Mr. MacShane: It is a pleasure to speak in tonight's Third Reading debate. For four years, I served on the Standing Committee considering the Finance Bill. In my view, it is the most interesting Standing Committee on which to serve because taxation represents the contract between the citizen and the state: it defines the relationship between the two and reaches into every corner of our existence. I regret that I have had to serve elsewhere for the last year, but no doubt one day my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will release me from those duties, unpaid and unimportant as they are, so that I can return to my first love—tax and the Standing Committee.

I pay tribute first to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, who has shown himself to be a fiscal Clausewitz. Clausewitz was the man who advised Napoleon at Austerlitz and then told him not to go to Moscow, but the French do not always take good German advice. Clausewitz believed in the concentration of forces. The Budget is the first in many years to focus hard on the key problems of the economy.

I should like to pay tribute to two personal friends—my hon. Friends the Financial Secretary and the Economic Secretary. Remarkably, having take a 450-page Bill through late-night sittings—we have heard from the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) that the Liberal Democrats are the Horlicks party; once it gets late, off they go to bed—my two hon. Friends, unlike many of their fellow Ministers, appear, at the end of their dreadfully busy first year, to be younger than ever. That shows that Tory replacement therapy works. I look forward to many years of service from them on the Front Bench, and to their getting younger year by year.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton spoke eloquently and in some detail. He was not present in Committee to vote against the clause to which he was referring, and was not here earlier to move his amendment. No doubt he was taking his Horlicks somewhere else. He is wrong on his narrow point about insurance premium tax. It used to be said before the last election that the Conservatives were the party of garage owners—I think that they were described as the garagiste tendency. The hon. Gentleman is speaking up for the garage owners of Britain because they cannot make a little extra on selling insurance. He should also explain whether he is now representing Dixons, because he was doing valiant battle for electrical retailers. That is all the more interesting, given that Sir Stanley Kalms, the boss of Dixons, is leading some ludicrous anti-European crusade. There we have the Liberal Democrats—all things to all men.

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman clearly was not listening to a word I was saying. I was speaking up for the ordinary consumer, who will lose out because of selective higher rates of insurance premium tax. The hon. Gentleman should be worried about that, because I am talking about his constituents.

Mr. MacShane: The ordinary consumer—or those who shop in Dixons—would be better served by a boss of Dixons who cut his prices rather than spending all his money on a crusade against Europe. We have had enough from the Davey lamp for the time being. There is very little illumination from that source.

I should like to focus briefly on how the Budget has affected my constituents. Rotherham is a great manufacturing centre. It still has Europe's biggest and most productive engineering steel plant. New firms are being created there. During the years in which I had the honour to serve the people of Rotherham before the last election, I often heard their demand for stability in the economy. We talk about the Tory 18 years or 19 years or whatever it was, but even before then my constituents suffered on an endless rollercoaster of inflation rates, interest rates and, of particular importance to my constituency, exchange rates.

The former Chancellor popped in for a brief chat—I see that his would-be successor, the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) has just appeared on the Front Bench. It is good to see him taking some time off from his new outside earnings. The Benches behind him are empty, because the Conservatives have given up on opposition. I thought that the constitutional duty of the Opposition was to oppose.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is indulging in a great deal of embroidery. He should come back to the Third Reading of the Finance Bill.

Mr. MacShane: I do not want to plunge into the outside earnings of the Conservative party, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Steel exporters had problems because between May 1990 and May 1997, the exchange rate of sterling against the deutschmark changed no fewer than 87 times. No exporter or manufacturer buying goods from the continent could live with that endless change. I know that the cliché "boom and bust" irritates the Conservatives, but I am happy to repeat it, because an awful lot of mud has to be thrown against a wall—even the empty wall opposite me—before it begins to stick. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor is searching for stability. I hope that he keeps to that aim.

There were disappointments for me in the Budget. I am a great believer in employee share ownership. I took a delegation to see my right hon. Friend and had an interesting meeting on the subject. There was nothing in the Budget on that, but I hope that the Government may come back to it. We must spread the fruits of people's work not just in wages, but in their share in the company for which they work.

The search for stability is an obsession of the Treasury Front Bench. I admire that. It contrasts with the flippant ups and downs of Budgets that I scrutinised as an Opposition member of Standing Committees considering previous Finance Bills. The Budgets of the previous Chancellor were like a Christmas tree—I think that that was the metaphor of the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce)—decorated with all sorts of funny baubles in an attempt to attract votes here, there and everywhere. The British people saw through that meretricious dishonesty and kicked him out. Since then, the Opposition have had considerable difficulty in deciding on their strategy. They have removed one shadow Chancellor, but we are still waiting for some impact from his successor.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am still waiting for the hon. Gentleman to come back to the Third Reading of the Finance Bill.

Mr. MacShane: I am particularly impressed by the Bill's step-by-step approach. Making work pay affects my constituents more than any other issue. Achieving that at the marginal rates of tax that we inherited from the Conservative party proved all but impossible. The Chancellor's two Budgets have shifted the burden of taxation, so that work is subject to less tax, and unearned income and capital takes a fairer share. The working families tax credit is a move towards lifting the burden of taxation from the lower-paid. In 1950, a married worker with two children had to earn 107 per cent. of average industrial earnings—about £20,000 in today's money—before he paid any tax; and we wonder why the Attlee Government were so popular. Until the end of the 1960s, the state took 30 or 35 per cent. of gross domestic product in tax. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor is taking us back to the golden years of stability, employment, growth and investment.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. MacShane: My hon. Friend must be quick; I want to sit down.

Ms Keeble: My hon. Friend has raised the point about making work pay. Does he agree that the £10 extra that the combined effects of the Finance Bill put into every average family's pocket in my constituency as a result of changes in tax structures will be extremely welcome, and is in complete contrast to the figures that Conservative Members have bandied about?

Mr. MacShane: The Conservative party was the party of the rich. Labour is the party of middle England and working England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland—people who seek to earn an honest living and to amass savings that guarantee their future.

The step-by-step approach is sometimes so silent that one does not detect it happening. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor is a sort of stealth bomber, coming quietly over the horizon, taking as much money as is necessary, but not too much, and dropping his bombs on the irrelevant Opposition. I wish him well. I know that the Budget was welcomed by the business community, working families and the poor of my constituency.

Mr. Gardiner: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. MacShane: If I may, I should like to finish. [Interruption.] Well, I could carry on. I wish the Finance Bill a handsome and solid majority on Third Reading.

7 pm

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, North and Leith): As someone who served on several Committees that examined Finance Bills in the previous Parliament, it gives me great pleasure and pride to speak about this Bill, which is in such marked contrast to the Bills that we opposed over those years—contrary to the view given by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), who has unfortunately fled the Chamber and the truth. Hon. Members who do not represent Scottish constituencies will not know that the Scottish National party's calculated core message is that Labour is the same as the Tories. That is arrant and demonstrable rubbish in the context of this Bill and, indeed, of other policies.

[Mr. Malcolm Chisholm]

The primary objectives of the Government's economic policy, as seen in the Budget and the Finance Bill, are to raise the economy's sustainable rate of growth and to fight against poverty and social exclusion. They are the exact opposite to the objectives of the previous Government, who increased inequality over 18 years, and for many of those years, used unemployment as a deliberate instrument of policy.

Throughout proceedings on the Bill, we have heard opportunistic carping on particular aspects of Government policy from both the SNP and the official Opposition. Some of those aspects are the unavoidable short-term results of correct long-term policies. We have never heard from either party any coherent alternative economic strategy. Throughout the economic debates this week, the Conservative party has also attempted to rewrite or, rather, airbrush history to try to persuade people that everything that happened before 1 May 1997 is irrelevant. That is economic illiteracy.

The context of the Finance Bill is the inheritance of the previous Government. The salient features of that inheritance were a lack of stability and economic credibility and a serious structural Budget deficit, which the previous Government failed to address, in spite of 22 tax rises in their last Parliament. On top of that, we inherited problems of inflationary bottlenecks due to underinvestment and chronic shortages in human capital. There was a major productivity gap between ourselves and our main competitors. We inherited, too, the well-known fact that one in five families were without anyone in work. Those are the problems that the Finance Bill and the two Budgets have begun to address. Clearly, such problems cannot be turned around in a day, a month or a even a year.

The Government are concerned to do three things: deliver macro-economic stability, tackle supply-side barriers to growth and promote economic and employment opportunities for all. I know that some of my colleagues who are impatient for more rapid change find the objective of macro-economic stability rather boring. It is very easy for the SNP and others to say that it is a Tory objective. It is also difficult to communicate some of the complex economic policies to the public at large. It must therefore be made clear time and again that delivering macro-economic stability is a means to an end. It is a necessary precondition for all the other objectives of growth and employment.

There are many reasons for achieving macro-economic stability. One of great importance is that, without it, there is the threat of a return to boom and bust and, therefore, a disincentive for employers and others to invest. Investment is very much at the heart of what this Government are all about. That is why pension fund arrangements were changed in the first Budget last summer. We heard opportunistic carping about that, too—certainly from the Conservative party. The policy's clear purpose was to increase investment in the economy.

Many other policies in the Finance Bill are directed towards the same end. We have a new rate of corporation tax, there have been changes to the capital gains tax regime and we have seen innovations such as the university challenge fund. Those are very important supply-side measures to deal with underinvestment. The Finance Bill also contains measures on training. The flagship welfare-to-work policy was introduced in the first Budget.

We must tell people that these are the objectives of Government policy; that this is what we are trying to achieve. By delivering macro-economic stability and tackling supply-side barriers to growth, we shall be able to raise growth. All that is a necessary precondition to our social objectives, on which we have already made significant progress. Most important, the working families tax credit, with its radical, innovative child care element, which we used to talk about endlessly in opposition and are beginning to deliver in government, clearly opens up employment opportunities and the rewards of employment to a much wider range of people.

Other policies in the Bill include changes in national insurance contributions, which act as an important incentive to employers to take on employees who earn up to £440 a week. There is a range of measures to make economic and employment opportunities more widely available. That is at the heart of the Government's strategy for tackling poverty and social exclusion in our society. When people say, as they sometimes do, "Why do you put emphasis on stability? Why don't you just get ahead and do something about poverty, unemployment and social exclusion?" it is important to explain that they are two sides of the same coin. That should be the core message that we try to get across.

Stability is not just about monetary policy—although that has been very important, and was dealt with in the separate Bank of England Bill. The purpose of that Bill should be explained, too. One of the reasons why the previous Government lacked any credibility was that they used interest rate policy politically. That was one of the problems that we inherited. They refused to put up interest rates before the election for political reasons, so inflation was heading for 4 per cent. and above. We had to address that problem; that is why interest rates have had to go up. The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan said that we were doing the same as the Tories. We are not; they tried to tackle inflation, but did not succeed. Their phoney monetary indicators in the early 1980s were not successful in dealing with inflation. We shall be successful. That is one side of the coin. It is, perhaps, more exciting to talk about the other side of the coin—the work opportunities and the attack on poverty—but without the precondition of stability, we shall not achieve those aims.

The same is true of fiscal policy, and I welcome the code for fiscal stability in the Finance Bill. As the Chancellor's public expenditure statement in June made clear, that fiscal framework does not mean that we are unable to deliver significant increases in public expenditure. I understand those who want a big bang approach to public expenditure—perhaps Liberal Democrats come into that category—but there is no point in having a big bang approach that cannot be sustained. Within the rules set out by the Chancellor, which were in our manifesto, we are able to achieve a real growth rate of 2.75 per cent. If that is sustained for the next five years, it will be an achievement that has not been managed since the 1960s.

The Government are also putting great emphasis on capital investment as part of the general drive for increased investment, which I referred to earlier, and we welcome that.

Clearly, the Government have the task of explaining their economic approach. It is very easy for the Opposition to caricature economic policy and dwell on short-term consequences, but this Government's economic objectives are absolutely contrary to those of the previous Government, and the results will also be contrary.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Do you agree that we are witnessing a sustained and concerted filibuster on the Bill, and are not such practices to be deplored by the Chair?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair is aware only of speeches that are in order or not in order. The speeches that I have heard have been in order, except where I have chosen to correct hon. Members. It has been known for debates on the Third Reading of the Finance Bill to continue for several hours.

Mr. Alexander: The broad themes of the Finance Bill, as well as the detail, emerged in Committee. In particular, as my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Chisholm) said, the Government have made it categorically clear that, unlike the previous Government, they are determined to encourage work. That aim has undoubtedly been welcomed by my constituents.

For many years, my constituency has had a rate of unemployment higher than the national average, which is why welfare to work is not a slogan in Paisley, South, but a vital programme for many of my constituents. As the Chancellor made clear in his Budget statement, the welfare-to-work programme is now to be extended to provide wider employment opportunities particularly to groups such as the long-term sick and disabled. That matter is close to the heart of my constituents. Indeed, my predecessor, Gordon McMaster, was acknowledged on both sides of the House as a tireless campaigner on behalf of disabled citizens. Only two weeks ago, in Paisley town hall, I attended an awards ceremony for disabled people who have now found employment and gained greatly from that experience.

In the previous Budget, £195 million was provided for voluntary advice and practical help to disabled citizens to move back into work. Pilots will begin this autumn, with a view to the programme being nationwide by April 2000.

That approach reflects the Government's coherent strategy—that there is no contradiction between social justice and economic efficiency—which underpinned the detailed measures in the Budget. For years, under the previous Government, we were told that the price of a modern, dynamic economy was a divided society, but the individualism that characterised Thatcherite economics has been found wanting on major challenges such as tackling unemployment, which I mentioned, social exclusion and the environment.

The understanding underpinning the Finance Bill is that the ingredients of a good society in a modern global economy are also the ingredients of a successful economy. The Budget made it clear that the foundation stone is encouraging and rewarding work. The working families tax credit announced in the Budget will help lower and middle-income Britain, particularly families with children, to keep more of what they earn. No family with earnings of less than £220 a week will now pay any income tax at all. Any family with a full-time worker is now guaranteed take-home pay of at least £180 a week. When people ask what the difference is between Labour and the Conservatives, they need look no further than that measure to see the difference that a Labour Government are making.

In keeping with the Government's recognition that good economics also makes for a good society, the Budget also addressed the needs of families in a modern economy. Child poverty has scarred this country for many years, as the work of organisations such as the Child Poverty Action Group has made clear. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith mentioned that one family in five is raising children in poverty. That figure is all too well known after 18 years of Conservative government. That is why the announcement that child benefit for the eldest child is to be raised by £2.50 a week or £130 a year from April 1999 was particularly welcomed in constituencies such as my own. In addition, the new child care tax credit, which forms part of the working families tax credit announced in the Budget statement, will be welcomed by families throughout the country.

A fortnight ago, I had the privilege of opening a new class at Auchenlodment nursery school in my constituency, when parent after parent told me about the importance of child care. What is fundamentally different about the Government's approach, as made clear in the Budget and the Finance Bill, is that child care is not some add-on to economic policy, but central to their economic strategy.

The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), who was in the Chamber earlier, talked about the importance of the service sector of the economy and to that extent—perhaps only to that extent—I agree. Yet I would argue that if the hon. Gentleman is keen to assist the service sector of the British economy, he should support the child care measures announced in the Budget, as women in particular will benefit from them and, of course, the service sector provides employment for huge numbers of women.

Another theme of the Finance Bill to which I shall address my remarks is the measures to promote enterprise. The Bill makes a further 1 per cent. cut in corporation tax to 30 per cent.—the lowest rate ever achieved in the United Kingdom. In the era of the global economy, such a measure sends a clear signal that the Labour Government want to secure investment and ensure that Britain is the home for dynamic, profitable companies. In the global economy, with increasing specialisation and diversity, new jobs will come from a large number of small companies, not a small number of large companies. That is why the Budget announced a comprehensive package of measures to create a more dynamic small business sector in the UK economy, including the 1 per cent. cut of the small business rate of tax to 20 per cent. from April 1999.

Another element of the Finance Bill—a distinctively Labour element—has been fairness in taxation and spending. As a country in the modern global economy, the more we learn, the more we shall ultimately be able to earn. We cannot hope to succeed economically if we do not succeed educationally. That is why I welcome the Chancellor's announcement that an extra £250 million in 1998-99 will be committed to schools and skills.

[Mr. Alexander]

To explain further the measures in the Budget, I point out that 80 per cent. of Britain's work force 10 years from now are already in the work force today. That is why, if we are serious about increasing workplace productivity in the United Kingdom economy, we must also direct our efforts towards raising skill levels of those already in work. I therefore particularly welcome the Chancellor's announcement of £10 million for the university for industry.

The final theme of the Finance Bill that I wish to touch on is stability. The need for stability has been mentioned in the debate and, given our country's economic record of boom and bust, it almost goes without saying. As the Bill makes clear, the key to modern economic success is to find the appropriate balance between stability and dynamism. Stability is essential for high levels of investment and employment.

The fiscal policy adopted by the Government adheres not only to the golden rule that over the economic cycle the Government will borrow only to invest, but to the rule that public debt will be held at a stable and prudent level over the economic cycle. The Finance Bill advances dynamism and stability, which is good economics, but it also advances measures on child care, child benefit and the working families tax credit, which is good politics and makes for a good society. The Bill ultimately nails the lie that the price of economic success is a divided society. That is why I commend it to the House.

7.18 pm

Dr. Palmer: We often criticise Ministers for departmentalitis and for focusing exclusively on their own area, but we, too, are somewhat guilty of that tonight. Typically, debates attract specialists in the subject, so today we have more finance nerds in the Chamber than would be seen in a month of Sundays anywhere else. It is said that the average man thinks about sex every 20 minutes during the day, but the population at large would be alarmed to learn that our little sub-population contains people who think more often than that about the public sector borrowing requirement.

Mr. Leslie: Steady on.

Dr. Palmer: I exempt my hon. Friend from my remark.

I should like to consider three aspects of how the Finance Bill affects different parts of the Government's agenda. First, there is the working families tax credit, which was announced in the Budget and which is foreshadowed in some of the measures in the Bill. We are introducing the working families tax credit, which may be the most sweeping act of redistribution in any Budget for the past 50 years and is certainly an impressive step forward in helping the working poor, partly for reasons of justice and partly to encourage a return to work—to nail the lie that it is more profitable to stay on benefits than to work. Together with the minimum wage, which we also introduced, it means that we can say definitively to ordinary people who are out of work that it pays to retrain, it pays to work with the advisers in the new deal and it pays to get back to work.

We have to recognise that there are people outside whom that message will not readily reach, because their daily lives are so desperate that they have no time to listen. They think that the working families tax credit is just one more obscure piece of politicians' jargon that bears little relationship to them. During the election, I canvassed a council estate where there is a high proportion of single parents. I met more people there who were not planning to vote at all than I met anywhere else in Broxtowe. They were not planning to vote, not because they were indifferent to politics, nor because they disliked all the parties, but because their daily lives were so desperate that they did not have time to consider the issues that we were putting before them. In the same way, I predict that we shall have difficulty showing those groups in society how the measures in the Budget and the Bill will transform their lives.

We have heard some unseemly gloating from Opposition Members about the fact that, in the initial reaction to the new deal, not everybody has taken up the offer with the alacrity for which we had hoped. One Opposition spokesman said, very cheerfully, that when they got the offer, many single parents threw it in the bin, as if that was good news of resistance to a tyrannical Government; but it is a tragedy when that sort of thing happens. My point is that the changes that we are making in the Finance Bill and foreshadowing to appear in next year's Finance Bill need to be followed up with publicity and information campaigns that reach people whom we do not normally reach—people who are indifferent to politics and who have given up the hope that the world of politics has any relevance to their world, or that anyone will come to their rescue. The Labour Government are determined to reach them and, through our efforts, we can make sure that such people benefit from the changes that we are making.

Secondly, I should like to talk about the foreshadowed change to vehicle excise duty. Curiously enough, it is unique to Britain that all cars—from the Mercedes Benz to the Ka—are taxed at exactly the same rate, regardless of how much petrol they use, or how efficiently they process petrol, or whether they use petrol at all. Environmental groups all welcome as a first step the action that we have taken. I commend to the House the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology technical report No. 116, which analyses the VED proposal in some detail and draws attention to the fact that the different ways in which the change could be introduced would have extremely varied impacts on the environment.

Broadly summarised, POST says that if we do that in the optimal way for reducing fuel consumption, the administrative burden will be considerably heavier, because most of the information at the car registration centre—the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency—is not currently geared to that sort of information. Ideally, each car would be examined for its emissions at the time of its MOT test and taxed accordingly; but MOT centres are not geared to communicate their results to the central vehicle registration centre at the DVLA, so considerable investment in technology would be needed to achieve that. One step back would be to tax according to car type, as tested at the time when the type was introduced. The vehicle emissions from a Vauxhall Astra 1997 would differ greatly from those of a 1993 Astra—if there was such a beast. Therefore, one could reward manufacturers that wanted to invest in fuel-efficient technology by changing the rate of tax according to that standard. The drawback of that method is that some manufacturers would produce a car that was extremely efficient on day one, but deteriorated rapidly. We want to support manufacturers that build energy-efficient motors to last and drivers who use their cars in a way that maintains that high level of energy efficiency.

I would argue that we should opt for those versions of the approach to vehicle excise duty that, in the longer term, can be used to phase in the measurement of individual vehicle emissions. Information technology is at the stage where, in five years' time, it will seem a trivial task for testing centres to communicate such information to the centre. I do not believe that, when introducing such an important principle for the first time, we should do so in a way that skimps on the essential objective of the change, which is to improve the efficiency of engines, to reduce emissions and, ultimately, to achieve the goals that we have set out to achieve in 2010.

Thirdly, I wish to highlight the generosity of the conditions for contributing to overseas development charities, which is a matter that has attracted relatively little comment—indeed, I know of overseas development activists who are still not totally aware of it. Although it has traditionally been said that overseas development is not an issue that the average member of the public finds fascinating, or attractive, or even welcome, that is certainly not what I have found in Broxtowe. Before the election, we published 15 policy papers on different issues—employment, health, education and so on—but it was the papers on the two more exotic subjects of overseas development and animal welfare that stimulated by far the greatest demand, with several hundred people requesting information on those subjects.

People have come to believe that politics in Britain has become a little bit too efficient and too oriented to the maximum level of marginal advantage at every level of the economy—that government and politics in Britain are in danger of losing their soul. When they look at the three aspects to which I have referred—the reinforcement of help to the working poor to make work worth while and to show that group in society that we care about them and that we are the first Government in 20 years to care about them; and our demonstration that we mean what we say about our environmental commitments and about our support for the developing world—the cynicism and disappointment that we have seen among many of our constituents can be countered and they will once again be able to have faith in the political process. I hope that the House will pass the Finance Bill. It is a worthy Bill, and I am proud to be associated with it.

7.29 pm

Mr. Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): A number of my hon. Friends refuted the intervention by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), who has wandered in and out of the Chamber at various times this afternoon and this evening, but has not stayed around to hear our responses. He asked what the Finance Bill does for manufacturing, which is important to my constituency. Historically, the black country has been a great manufacturing area and manufacturing is an important part of the economy, although I acknowledge that it accounts now for only about one fifth of national income.

The Bill contains important measures to encourage manufacturing, industry and enterprise. First, it will reduce the rates of corporation tax. Secondly, it contains important provisions on capital allowances. Thirdly, it will change the company tax regime, which was an important feature of this Government's first Finance Bill—this Bill will continue to put that change in place.

Opposition Members raised all sorts of difficulties with the changes that we have made. Some of them still cannot accept the fact that we have put in place a corporation tax regime that will be more conducive to investment. Too often in the past people, institutions, pension funds and insurance companies tried to maximise the return on dividend income, to the detriment of investment in enterprises. Labour's two Finance Bills will put in place a corporation tax system that will encourage investment.

The move from the old to the modern system, which, incidentally, is a feature of such countries as the United States, creates certain transitional problems, but the Government have tried to deal with them, for example, through the phasing-in provisions to benefit charities. I raised certain problems concerning pensioner non-taxpayers, who will lose their tax credits under the Bill, with my hon. Friend the Paymaster General, who took that matter to heart. He and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will deal with that in the coming months. The important point, which seems to be lost on the Opposition, is that the new corporation tax regime will be more conducive to an enterprise economy.

The fourth feature that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan did not seem to take into account was the change in capital gains tax—the taper relief. Opposition Members raised a great deal of dust about the transitional problems that might arise due to the changes, but the taper relief system will encourage long-term investment holdings. The system works by reducing the proportion of capital gain that is liable to tax according to how long the asset is held. Different tapers will apply to business and non-business assets.

Members of the official Opposition—[HON. MEMBERS: "They are not here."] Yes, as my hon. Friends remind me, there are not many Conservative Members in the Chamber at present. They did not acknowledge that the taper relief system would have any effect on investment. Unfortunately, they do not seem to know their own economic history. They do not seem to realise that when they introduced major changes in the 1980s, these had a significant impact on investment. The changes in 1984 resulted in a surge in investment, which fell off in 1986 when the changes were reversed.

A study by Stephen Bond of Nuffield college reached the conclusion, based on that experience, that a tax system can affect investment. In considering the changes after 1986, Bond concluded that a tax system that leaves the cost of capital permanently higher by one to two percentage points is likely to depress the level of company investment by up to 5 per cent. Conversely, the changes in this Bill ought significantly to affect investment in time.

Mr. Derek Twigg: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. Labour Members have often been accused of not understanding business and investment, but is it not the case that the Government want to encourage long-term investment and sustainable help for business? If we had accepted the Opposition's arguments, the Bill would have done nothing to help business. Their arguments were about short-termism and other matters, but had nothing to do with helping business.

Mr. Cranston: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. The Opposition focused on some specific points and did not seem to see the big picture.

In a recent summary of some 10 studies that assessed the impact of corporation tax and capital gains tax on investment, Mr. Jack Mintz states

"The overall conclusion one derives from recent studies is that taxes affect investment decisions".

Conservative Members did not seem to acknowledge that important point. The changes in the Bill will have a beneficial effect on investment and manufacturing, particularly in the long term.

Fairness is another feature of the Bill. My hon. Friends have mentioned the important inducement to altruism contained in the provisions on millennium relief. Another feature worthy of mention is the way in which we have closed provisions that were conducive to tax avoidance. In Committee, Conservative Members seemed to be in a world of large capital gains.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington): And even larger houses.

Mr. Cranston: Yes, as my hon. Friend reminds me, it was a world of great wealth—

Mr. Plaskitt: Auctions.

Mr. Cranston: Of auctions and large investments, and that is not the world of the average voter, who is more concerned with measures in the Bill aimed at introducing a fairer regime, which will benefit the average person.

No Conservative Member mentioned the important provisions on transfer pricing as regards the activities of transnational companies and there was little mention of the provisions to deal with inheritance tax and closing some of the avoidance mechanisms there. We heard some squealing about the bed-and-breakfast provisions, as if those were a natural feature of any tax regime. In fact, they were an important avenue for tax avoidance.

Mr. Love: Does my hon. Friend share my astonishment at the cynicism shown by Conservative members of the Standing Committee, who continually chided the Government for abandoning the poor, despite the fact that the Conservative Government created the greatest inequality since figures began? Does he agree that the Bill will help to heal society and to reduce the divisions that the Conservatives created?

Mr. Cranston: I agree. The figures demonstrate that inequality grew more in this country than in any other Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development country, apart from New Zealand, which was a scandal.

In Committee, we heard a great deal from Conservative Members about the legislative process; they said that the Government did not listen. The Government do listen. There was extensive consultation about the changes in capital gains tax, for example, as a result of which the taper relief system was developed. Similarly, the Government listened to representations about individual savings accounts. There were no U-turns, as we said from the outset that we would consult people—something the Conservative Government never did—about what regime would encourage more saving.

Mr. Patrick Hall (Bedford): On the Government's willingness to listen, I wonder whether my hon. Friend heard, earlier today, the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) describe a Government amendment, which was tabled as a result of listening to people and which will improve the Bill, as a climbdown? Does not that show that the Conservative party's attitude to government is completely different from the Labour party's?

Mr. Cranston: That is very good point. The Labour Government are responsible; they consult people and work with business. The Conservative Government did not do that—Conservative Members do not know what consultation is, which is why they cannot understand this Government.

Also on legislative form, I want to deal with the canard that we have heard from the Opposition about retrospectivity. People have all sorts of expectations, but, historically, those expectations have often been disappointed because of taxation changes. When the rate of personal taxation increases, as it has in the past, I am disappointed. That is not retrospectivity, but Conservative Members do not understand that concept—they have misdirected their fire on that, as they have on so many other matters.

We also heard a great deal from Conservative Members about the regulation-making powers in the Bill. As my hon. Friend the Paymaster General said in Committee, the Bill contains no more regulation-making provisions than were in the last two Finance Bills under the Conservative Government. Such provisions are a typical feature of legislation—that may be unfortunate, and it may be more desirable if everything were provided for in primary legislation, but, as Conservative Members have reminded us, the Bill already runs to 450 pages—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. Conversations are breaking out all over the Chamber. Hon. Members must listen to the hon. Gentleman who is addressing the House.

Mr. Cranston: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

In creating regulation-making powers, we have been consulting. The draft regulations are available for several months, so that the business community and professional bodies that will be affected by them can give their comments.

The Bill fosters enterprise; it introduces stability; it facilitates altruism in the way that I suggested; and it puts in place important measures to ensure fairness.

7.44 pm

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside): No one should be surprised at the token and transitory presence of Conservative Members during our discussion of this vital Bill. They must find it extremely distressing, I am convinced, to see the beginning of the end of the work that they did over 18 years and to see the damage that they inflicted on so many members of our society being reversed.

The Bill, indeed, starts to reverse major parts of the previous Government's policy. Eighteen years of Tory rule produced greater inequality than at any time since the second world war. The poorest 20 to 30 per cent. of the population failed to benefit from economic growth, and the poorest payed the highest marginal rates of tax. Moreover, unemployment—in terms of the number of households suffering unemployment—doubled so that one in five households had someone out of work. I represent the most deprived constituency in the most deprived city in the country, so, day after day, I see the evidence of what happened. I note that all but three Conservative Members find the debate too painful to listen to.

The Bill will enact a Budget to start a new era. It will give more help to most members of our society, and it will give the most help to those who are the worst off. The poorest 20 per cent. of households with children will gain an average of £500 per year—that will assist 3.8 million children. That is in great contrast to Conservative Budgets, which inflicted the greatest hardships on the poorest and gave the greatest benefit to the best off. The Bill reduces the high marginal rates of tax on those in the lower income groups, which makes a significant start in ensuring equity.

The Budget helps all families. It provides for the highest ever increase in child benefit—again, that is in stark contrast to what happened under the Conservative Government, who significantly reduced the value of child benefit. The Budget also extends the new deal, to give new hope of employment to younger people and older people alike. The official Opposition are still opposed to that measure.

The Bill will direct most help to those who need it most. In doing so, it will develop and stimulate the economy as a whole. That is why I welcome the Budget's provision for significant capital investment, which will be implemented in such a way as to improve services for the community and to create relevant and important jobs. For example, the £250 million extra investment in education—making a total of £2.5 billion extra investment in education—will improve services and buildings and provide further essential jobs. The £500 million extra investment in the national health service—making a total of more than £2 billion extra—will improve services and employment.

The £500 million extra for public transport will help us to secure better infrastructure to improve our environment; it will also develop the economy and produce more jobs.

Mr. Patrick Hall: My hon. Friend mentioned extra money for education and health. Does she agree that it is ironic that the Opposition parties have criticised the Government for not spending enough extra on education and health when the Government have spent far more than the Conservatives or Liberal Democrats would have spent, according to their printed and announced programmes?

Mrs. Ellman: Indeed. The Budget marks a decisive change. We are investing in the economy and in jobs.

In addition to significant capital investment, the Budget makes special efforts to help small and medium enterprises: the backbone of our economy. The Budget encourages that important sector by raising capital allowances and reducing taxes on those enterprises. Its encouragement for more innovative technologies promises more jobs, to the benefit of the whole economy.

The Budget should be considered in the context of the Government's general policies. It is directed towards producing more social and economic fairness. The Government are intervening to ensure that its benefits are felt where they are most needed, which is why we are going ahead with regional development agencies that will bring together the public, private and voluntary sectors to invest in regional economies. I note that the official Opposition are opposed to regional development agencies, as they are opposed to anything constructive.

The Budget promotes our efforts to deal with social exclusion, which is another inheritance of the 18 years of Tory rule. It also promotes communications. It took a Labour Government to rescue the shambles of the channel tunnel rail link deal left by the Tories. That will be important to the regions and the whole country.

Mr. Derek Twigg: My hon. Friend will know that my constituency is only a few miles from hers. She hit on the important point that the Budget and the Government's general policies are designed to benefit not only the south-east but the whole country. We want the communication links to be in place and the economy of the whole country to be vibrant.

Mrs. Ellman: My hon. Friend makes an important point. It is essential that the Budget should deal effectively with the macro-economic situation, but for that to be effective we also need mechanisms to deal with regional and local issues, to ensure that the benefits are enjoyed where they are most needed. I applaud the Government for all that they have done on macro, micro and regional levels.

The Budget is the beginning of the creation of a new era. It is highly regrettable that the official Opposition cannot even bear to hear about it.

Mr. Love: Does my hon. Friend note the fact that Her Majesty's official Opposition moved none of the amendments that they tabled today? The foreign earnings deduction amendments took a whole day in Committee, but no one from the official Opposition was here to move them today.

Mrs. Ellman: My hon. Friend demonstrates effectively the official Opposition's ineffectiveness and irresponsibility. Their record speaks for itself. They created a divided society and record unemployment and showed a callous disregard for justice. The Budget is the beginning of a new era and I commend it to the House. I look forward to the Government developing policies that will bring social and economic justice to the country as a whole.

Mr. Patrick Hall: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am inspired by the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) to seek your guidance on whether the absence of contributions from the official Opposition demonstrates a sustained abdication of responsibility.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for the Chair.

7.55 pm

Mrs. Liddell: Several of my hon. Friends have drawn attention to the vast emptiness on the Opposition Benches. It would be useful if the House were aware of the fact that the official Opposition asked for two days to discuss the Finance Bill on the Floor of the House. As a Government who are committed to proper accountability and scrutiny, we were happy to arrange for those two days, but chaos has reigned on the Opposition Benches from day one.

I thought that the high point—or perhaps the low point—had come when the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) had to be got out of his bed in the middle of the night and brought into the House to adjudicate in a fight between his Front-Bench and Back-Bench colleagues. The Whips had totally abdicated responsibility and had to send for the right hon. Gentleman to haud the jaikets, as we say in the west of Scotland. I am glad that he had the chance to change out of his jammies before coming to the House.

We have had a good debate, and I commend my hon. Friends for some studied speeches that obviously took great preparation. We take the job of government extremely seriously. We regard the tasks of government and of representing our constituents as a privilege, which is why we have worked so hard on Third Reading. I am grateful to my hon. Friends on the Back Benches for the assistance that they have given to Ministers.

I pay especial tribute to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, who has had the heaviest burden. This has been a lengthy and detailed Bill. Not all the work takes place in the House, because much preparation has to be done in advance.

The debate has been remarkable in that we have had the rare privilege of a visit from the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond). It is always a pleasure to see him at his work. I am sorry that he did not manage to stay in the Chamber terribly long, but he addressed us from his Olympian heights and I will respond to him with pleasure.

Mr. Salmond rose—

Mrs. Liddell: I have to consider whether I should give way to the hon. Gentleman, because, with characteristic arrogance, he refused to take interventions from my hon. Friends this evening. However, I will of course take his intervention, because it is so rare a pleasure to see him at his work.

Mr. Salmond: That must be the longest preamble to giving way that I have ever heard. [HON. MEMBERS: "Get on with it."] Well, if the concession is so long, the intervention can be long as well.

The Economic Secretary is building a case on the presence or absence of hon. Members in the Chamber. Where, then, are the Chancellor and the Prime Minister?

Mrs. Liddell: Running the country.

The hon. Gentleman made a number of points— [Interruption.] I wish my hon. Friends would stop making me laugh. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps we can now return to the contents of the Finance Bill.

Mrs. Liddell: I am happy to do so, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We have observed some interesting gyrations on the part of the Opposition Front Bench. I am not just talking about the fact that no Opposition Front Bencher managed to stay in the Chamber throughout the debate; during the Bill's passage, we have seen a radical reversal of the Opposition's views on capital gains tax. Moreover, as my hon. Friends have pointed out, the Opposition have tabled amendments whose cost would total around £7 billion, and have given no explanation of where they would find the money to finance them. Which taxes would they increase? Which public expenditure would they cut? As my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary said the other night, the Conservatives are beginning to beat the Liberals Democrats in terms of imprudent economics.

There has been a challenge to a number of our measures—important measures, aimed at making the tax system fairer. For example, Opposition Members tabled an amendment seeking to exempt from tax people working overseas and earning salaries of at least £87,000 a year. I recognise that that may not be a great deal of money for those with extensive outside interests, but, believe me, it is a lot of money from my constituents' point of view.

There was an entirely spurious attempt to focus debate on the number and scope of regulation-making powers, rather than on the important measures in the Bill. Throughout our consideration of the Bill, spurious arguments have been advanced, often on behalf of "special interest" groups. That, I think, is a measure of how ineffective the Opposition were in the task of opposing: they ran out of steam before we could even complete Third Reading.

I contend that one reason for the exodus from the Chamber this evening is the fact that the scale of revulsion in the country at the economic policies that the Conservatives pursued in opposition is beginning to dawn on them. The last time I saw the Opposition Benches so empty, Conservative Members were off looking for another leader. Perhaps that is what is happening now. [Interruption.] As my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Ainsworth) has just pointed out, perhaps they are off looking for work. A number of Conservatives had to do that after 1 May last year.

Let me now deal with what was said by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan. The other day, his party's Treasury spokesman was interviewed on BBC Radio Scotland. When asked about his party's economic policies, he said that industry would have to hope for the best. That is the "fingers crossed" school of economics: the emblem of the Scottish National party should be a lucky bunch of white heather.

In one of the interventions to which we have become so used during our debates on the Bill—an intervention of great erudition—my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston) took the hon. Gentleman's arguments on manufacturing apart—but, predictably, the hon. Gentleman was not present to hear him. Nor, having referred to the importance of the service industries in Scotland, was he present to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Alexander) draw attention to the attack on those industries—especially the financial services industry—that had been launched by the Scottish National party in the past fortnight. Fortunately, Labour Members do not go in for that kind of behaviour.

My hon. Friend the Member for Paisley, South made a good point about the money that the Government have set aside for the university for industry. May I also remind the House of the £50 million that has been made available in the Budget for the university challenge fund? My hon. Friend's constituency contains the university of Paisley, which is known for its ability to convert research ideas into development projects that make a considerable amount of money for the Scottish economy. I am sure that he and his constituents will benefit greatly from that.

We heard some interesting contributions from the Liberal Democrats. The Liberal Democrats were a constant source of entertainment to us in Committee. In Committee, we had an opportunity to congratulate the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on his wedding and his honeymoon, but I am not sure that the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) had the same excuse for not being present. Tonight he raised the issue of insurance premium tax, although earlier he had had the opportunity to speak to an amendment on the subject but was not present to do so. In Committee, he failed to vote against a measure that he has described as reprehensible. He has also sought, at this late stage, to introduce a measure that would undermine an important anti-avoidance provision in the Bill. Labour Members do not find that acceptable. The insurance premium tax rate is designed to ensure that there is neither the incentive nor the scope for VAT avoidance.

It is unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends did not get their act together sufficiently to allow debate on these matters. It would have been illuminating for people outside to see the extent to which the Liberal Democrats are not prepared to pursue anti-avoidance measures. Like many of their proposals, the proposal of which the hon. Gentleman spoke tonight would have cost the country a good deal of money—more than £400 million. It is a case of spend, spend, spend—and at no point are we given any indication of how the Liberal Democrats would put the economy on to the stable basis that is required for long-term good. [Interruption.]

The hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) who has not taken enough interest in the Bill to participate in the debate—we are becoming accustomed to such behaviour from Liberal Democrat Members—refers, from a sedentary position, to closures and redundancies in the economy. The hon. Gentleman would be better placed to make such remarks if he were prepared to engage in coherent economic argument about how we can improve our economy. The Bill is another step towards ensuring that the country moves into a climate of economic stability that will provide sustainable growth, and allow businesses and households to plan for the future.

We have had 18 years of boom and bust. We have had 18 years of economic incompetence. Anyone who wants to see the scale of that incompetence need only read the Hansard reports of debates on past Finance Bills, which will reveal some of the weakest and most spurious arguments ever advanced in the House.

The Budget that we have introduced is a Budget for fairness. At last we have a Government who are committed to fairness for all. As a consequence of this Budget, the least advantaged members of society will be given extra assistance. Those who seek to create wealth will find themselves in a climate that will allow them, not just to develop their own businesses, but to bring about an atmosphere that will enable our economy to thrive.

This is a Budget from a Government who look forward rather than back. I repeat that it is a Budget for the many, not the few. That is the sea change that has been created; that is the difference between this Government and the Government who went before.

I am proud of what was done by my hon. Friends in Committee, and am grateful for the support that they have given the Financial Secretary, the Paymaster General and me. I am also grateful to all who the Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg) have taken the message of this Budget to men and women the Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg) throughout the country. Earlier, my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Twigg) said that people had stopped him in the street to congratulate the Government on the Budget. That happened to me, too. [Interruption.] The cackles of the Opposition prove that their arrogance is undiminished. Their lack of understanding of the ordinary people of the United Kingdom has not advanced at all. Tonight sees the completion of an important stage in the Government's programme. I commend the Bill to the House with great pride.

Clause 19

NEW ARRANGEMENTS FOR GIVING FINANCIAL SUPPORT TO STUDENTS

8.23 pm

The Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office (Mr. Brian Wilson): I beg to move,

That this House insists on its amendment in page 14, to leave out lines 31 to 49, to which the Lords have disagreed and disagrees to the amendment proposed by the Lords in lieu of that amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss motion No. 2:–

That this House insists on its amendment in page 22, to leave out lines 31 to 39, to which the Lords have disagreed.

I inform the House that the Lords disagreement to the two Commons amendments and the Lords amendment in lieu involve privilege.

Mr. Wilson: The motions invite the House to insist on two amendments that it made earlier, thereby deleting two amendments carried in another place.

I return to this subject with enthusiasm. I am delighted again to have the opportunity to state the purposes of the funding changes for higher education, which are simply to widen access to it and get more money into it. As I have acknowledged at the Dispatch Box before, the Tories were good at getting the numbers in. No one criticises them for that, although they might be criticised for their motives or the haphazard way it was done. They substantially increased the numbers in higher education, but they did not put the money in to follow the students and thereby maintain the standards of higher education and research on which this country depends for its economic future. That is the inheritance which the Government are addressing. We are determined not to be distracted from it.

We invite the House to reverse the Lords amendments, because we are not going to accept changes to the legislation, under any guise or subterfuge, that will eat away at the considerable sums of money that will be available to higher education as a result of the Bill and the Government's courage in facing up to the funding shortfall in higher education.

Whatever the reservations of principals, or anyone else, on the issues that we are discussing, they, too, recognise the need for the reforms to get additional money into their universities. Faced with the chaos that the Opposition parties seek to visit on the legislation or the certainty of additional funding as a result of the Bill, there is not the slightest doubt that anyone in the academic community would accept that the Bill is good for higher education. Any dilution of the funds available to it as a result of the Lords amendments would be bad news for them, for their institutions and, most important, for the next generation of students in higher education.

On consideration of the amendments, the Lords insisted on their original amendments returning to this House. The proposed alternative to the original amendment No. 64 is in a slightly different form, but that does not make it any more acceptable. I repeat what my hon. Friends and I have said many times before. We oppose such amendments not only because of the financial arguments that I have adduced but because they aim to prevent the Government from making provision for financial assistance with fees that takes into account the indisputable diversity of the education systems in different parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): What legal advice in relation to a case that may be tested in the European Court has either the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, whose presence we welcome, or Scottish Office Ministers had on their proposals? Are they absolutely sure that it is legally watertight?

Mr. Wilson: As an honorary graduate in science of Edinburgh university, my hon. Friend will understand the dangers of the words "absolute" and "certainty". Within those parameters, it is self-evident that we would not have promoted the legislation if the legal advice was not firmly in favour of it in all its aspects.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Wilson: No.

The central charge of our critics in this matter is that the Bill creates an inequity in the United Kingdom. I want at the outset to say that the precise opposite is the truth. By following to the letter the recommendations of the Dearing and Garrick committees—I remind the Conservatives that they established them—we have created equality of opportunity for every student to study for an honours degree while contributing no more than £3,000 in tuition fees, if they are liable at all for them. That is the equity that Dearing and Garrick asked for and what we have delivered.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): Does the Minister accept that the Dearing report said that maintenance grants could stay? If Ministers are to claim the Dearing report in aid why do they not implement it?

Mr. Wilson: If we implemented Dearing, every student would pay £1,000 a year in tuition fees. [Interruption.] Barracking will not win this argument, I assure hon. Members. We accepted the principle, as I believe everyone does, that in order to have a well-funded higher education system, it was necessary that those who benefited from it directly made some contribution to it. We decided that it was right to exempt those from households on below average incomes from tuition fees. We did that to protect those from less well-off backgrounds in accordance with our central aim of widening access to higher education.

As the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) is well aware, this debate is not a reopening of the debate on funding. It is specifically on the Lords amendments. The unpalatable truth which I have offered him is that the Dearing and Garrick committees set up by the previous Administration made a specific recommendation. We looked at the issue of fairness and we have come up with exactly what Dearing and Garrick came up with. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the Division lists from the Lords debate last week, it may interest him to see where the name of Lord Dearing is positioned. Lord Dearing understands the arguments with which we are dealing tonight and is not interested in the political argy-bargy. The specific point about fairness is addressed in the amendments.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Wilson: In a little while.

The Dearing committee recommended that we address fully what some people rather improbably describe as the Scottish anomaly, but I describe as the distinctive character of the Scottish education system, which we shall defend. It is not, need never be and should never be identical to the English one. It is based on different school qualifications. It is a different higher education system, and that is exactly what we intend to maintain.

The point of fairness with which the House should be concerned tonight is simple. The normal Scottish route to an honours degree at a Scottish university is a four-year course. It is a broadly based higher education system which fits a broadly based school system. The qualifications and the time scale for achieving them flow from the school system. The Dearing-Garrick recommendation has been met in full. Scottish students should not pay more for their normal route to an honours degree than students in other parts of the United Kingdom. That is the central point of fairness, and it has been addressed.

Mr. Welsh: I heard the Minister say that he was following the Dearing report to the letter. Had he done so, he would have maintained student grants. Just in case Hansard magically gets altered, can the Minister explain that? Or is he cherry-picking? He rightly praises the Scottish four-year degree, but in this House he called it a bogus tradition. He seems to be all over the place on this. Why does he not restore fairness by abolishing the anomaly and getting rid of the discretion against English students? If he followed Dearing to the letter, he would not have abolished grants.

Mr. Wilson: The hon. Gentleman should not talk about cherry-picking, unless he is following Dearing to the letter, in which case he will advocate that every student, irrespective of family income, should pay £1,000 a year in tuition fees. If that is the new policy of the Scottish National party, he is welcome to tell us, but if he is not telling us that, why is he talking about cherry-picking? The hon. Gentleman is revisiting the general point.

I have said clearly that we did not accept the idea of £1,000 per student per year, irrespective of income. We think that that would be inequitable. The hon. Gentleman may disagree with us, but we want to widen access and ensure that people from less well-off backgrounds do not pay tuition fees. As I pointed out to the hon. Member for Havant, the specific point is the Lords amendment and the question of fourth-year tuition fees. On that point, we are following Dearing and Garrick to the letter.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Wilson: I will not give way.

Dearing and Garrick said nothing about the same concession for students from other parts of the United Kingdom who opt for the longer Scottish honours courses, with which their qualifications do not easily interface. Such students have always chosen to accept higher costs by choosing, as is their perfect right, the longer Scottish honours degree courses. They accept the additional maintenance costs that are obviously entailed in a four-year, as opposed to a three-year, course. They also choose to forgo a year of earnings. They are welcome to make that choice. They are an extremely valuable part of the Scottish higher education system, but they make their choice in the full knowledge that they are going into a longer course which entails higher cost.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Does the Minister accept that, over the years, English students in many parts of the country have made a choice to opt for a more expensive form of study by going to London, and that the state has properly recognised the additional cost and helped them to study in London? That is different from the example that he is setting forward, in which the state penalises students who choose a more expensive form of study.

Mr. Wilson: If the hon. Gentleman is referring to maintenance costs for students in London, I think that is an interesting issue, but not the one that we are discussing tonight. [Laughter.] With respect, we are not discussing a principle. We are not having an academic debate. We are discussing specific Lords amendments that deal with the one issue of the four-year degree in Scotland and—I shall come to this in a moment—the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Wilson: I will not give way. Perhaps if things are dull later, we can have some fun, but for the moment I will not give way.

If people went for a four-year honours degree course, they were of course going to be involved in greater costs than if they studied in other parts of the United Kingdom and did a three-year course. It is simply not credible—this is where the dishonesty lies in the argument—that the levying of fourth-year tuition fees on a means-tested basis will be a decisive factor in determining whether students go to a Scottish university.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley): Do the figures on take-up which we have so far show any evidence that English and Welsh students have been disproportionately put off applying to Scottish universities? What are the proportionate changes for Scottish, England and Welsh student applications and for applications from the European Union?

Mr. Wilson: I can give my hon. Friend all the figures, but she makes the point in her question. There is not a shred of statistical evidence to suggest that the effect that has been predicted or wished for by Opposition Members is happening. To take one statistic, there are 33,000 applications from the rest of the United Kingdom to Scottish universities, compared to 27,000 from within Scotland. There is a proportionate increase in applications to Scottish universities from England and a numerical and proportionate increase in applications from Wales. Where is the evidence in any of that of the effect that hon. Members suggest?

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Perhaps I can be of assistance to my hon. Friend by giving him statistics that come straight from the Universities and Colleges Admission Service. Applications to Scottish universities are down 4.5 per cent. from last year. Applications to Scottish universities from England are down 4.1 per cent. and those from Northern Ireland are down 5.5 per cent.

Mr. Wilson: Characteristically, my hon. Friend quotes helpful figures. They show that the very modest increase from England is substantially less than the cross-border flow. We have said that there is a proportionate increase in applications from Scotland of people wishing to go to England, and a numerical increase in applications from Wales. There is a decrease in the number of people going from Scotland to English universities. If the logic of the Opposition's argument has anything to commend it, they will have to explain why there is a decrease, rather greater in numerical terms, in the number going from Scotland to England. People are clearly not deterred by fourth-year tuition fees, and it is nonsense to suggest that they will deter people. All the statistics refute the Opposition's case.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): Perhaps I could put a specific case. My dad and my granddad were brewers, and at one time the only United Kingdom university offering a brewing degree was Heriot-Watt. If a specific degree course is available only in a Scottish university, as may happen now or in future, why should an English, Welsh or Northern Irish student who wants to follow a perfectly proper degree course have to pay more than if the same course were on offer in an English, Welsh or Northern Irish university?

Mr. Wilson: It is all part of choice. The hon. Gentleman's grandfather chose to be a brewer. That was commendable, but it was a choice. I do not know the hon. Gentleman's antecedents but, given his mode of transport today, I assume that he has fairly humble origins. Some 40 per cent. of students in Scottish universities, from whichever part of the United Kingdom they come, will pay nothing at all in tuition fees. Perhaps the family brewing empire would have been able to start unhindered under these arrangements.

Mr. Ian Bruce: The Minister opened the debate on a note on which we could all agree when he said that Government policy should always be to get more people into university. The Minister has had a long plane trip from Scotland and I am sure that the House is grateful to him for turning up. Surely he knows that, next year, the number of people who will go to university will be down for the first time. Surely he realises that Government policy is wrong. He should correct it by accepting the Lords amendments.

Mr. Wilson: Rarely has a man waited so long to say so little, and the hon. Gentleman is wrong. We have applications, but we do not have admissions. Scottish universities could be filled several times over with current applicants, and there are more applications from the rest of the United Kingdom than from Scotland. We think that we have the right policy to get more money into higher education, and the next part of our job in overcoming Opposition misinformation is to make sure that potential students have access to accurate information and that applications are turned into admissions. We shall do exactly that.

Let us look at the figures and put the issue in perspective. There are many problems and challenges in education. There is a need to get more money in, to open up opportunities and to ensure that the 11 per cent. of people from lower-income backgrounds in higher education is brought nearer to the 80-plus per cent. of the top two social groups. Those are important issues, and I should have liked to hear the other place discuss them. It did not. It has not sent us a demand for more egalitarianism or more opportunity in education. There is not a word about that. The narrow issue affects a small number of people and has an influential pressure group made up of a small number—I might say a minority—of university principals who have the ear of some people in the House of Lords and in the Opposition. That is why the issue has been elevated to a high point of principle, which it is not.

On the basis of last year's admissions, about 6,000 students will come from the rest of the United Kingdom to Scottish universities. I have no doubt that there were 6,000 last year, and that there will be 6,000 next year when all the got-up excitement will be forgotten. The numbers will not change significantly, and between a third and 40 per cent. of those students will pay nothing in tuition fees and will be completely unaffected by the argument, except in the sense that they might be misled by Opposition Members into believing that they will pay tuition fees.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) rose—

Mr. Wilson: I am trying to give a breakdown of the figures, but if the hon. Gentleman cannot contain himself I shall give way.

Mr. Randall: I am grateful to the Minister for his courtesy.

The Minister says that a small number of people discussed the issue in the other place. Why were there no Scottish Members on the Standing Committee from the Labour party, the Liberal Democrat party or the Scottish National party? I agree that Conservative Members are at a disadvantage. However, it would have been nice if some Scottish Members had debated these issues.

Mr. Wilson: The Committee's make-up is a matter for the Committee of Selection. I have no wish to cast aspersions on the minor parties. They can speak for themselves if they want. Although, in many ways, this issue affects the Department for Education and Employment more than us, whenever it has come here, it has focused on Scotland, so I have taken responsibility for answering at the Dispatch Box on the Floor of the House, and I do not shirk from that.

Several hon. Members rose—

8.45 pm

Mr. Wilson: I want to finish the breakdown.

A third of those students will pay nothing at all over the four years, so there is no impact. Some will pay very small amounts, because it is a means-tested system. Again, I go back to the point that anyone who thinks that that will be the decisive factor in determining whether students go to Edinburgh, St. Andrews or a university in England is not living in the real world. Many students take an honours degree and they are not affected either. There are others who enter in the second year and they are not affected either. When we take all those categories out, at most, we are talking about 1,200 students from England, who will be asked to pay £1,000 extra over the four years.

It is of interest to know where those students come from—what backgrounds they come from and whether this is likely to be a burden on their shoulders, which will be crucial in determining the outcome—so I made some inquiries into the top four schools supplying students to Edinburgh and St. Andrews universities. My hon. Friends should listen to this point, because they will get some idea. They will be listening anxiously for schools in their constituency to find out if it is their constituents who will be affected.

The pecking order of schools supplying students from England to Edinburgh and St. Andrews universities is: No. 1, Eton college; No. 2, Wellington college; No. 3, Charterhouse; and, No. 4, Westminster school. That tells us something about the wonderful, egalitarian education system that we have in Scotland. There is only one school in Scotland that sends more pupils to Edinburgh and St. Andrews universities combined than Eton college: George Watson's college in Edinburgh. If that is an egalitarian system, which we have to defend in the Division Lobby tonight, I want no part of that defence.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Presumably, the Minister would not apply those questions on social class to students from Northern Ireland, who will be discriminated against on his position.

The Minister said earlier that he wanted to defend the four-year degree, except that, at column 794 on 8 June, he described it as a "bogus tradition", so will he tell the House: what is it? Is he intent on defending the four-year honours degree, or does he still regard it as a "bogus tradition", as he did last month?

Mr. Wilson: That is a characteristic sleight of syntax, because I did not describe the four-year degree as bogus. I know exactly what I said because I saw the glow of excitement on the hon. Gentleman's face when I said it. I will recap what I said—it goes back into the general debate, but I am happy to recap.

When I and, I suspect, the hon. Gentleman went to university, a relatively small minority of Scottish school leavers who went to university did honours degrees. If I remember rightly, roughly 30 per cent. did four-year honours degrees and 70 per cent. did ordinary degrees. In the interim, that has turned around, so that 70 per cent. do honours degrees over four years and a small minority do ordinary degrees, which are then, by inference, regarded as inferior to the norm of the four-year honours degree.

What I said and stand by is that something that grows up over that relatively short period is not a tradition. It is bogus to call it a tradition, because a tradition goes back centuries, not 30 years. It is the norm of the four-year honours degree in Scotland that is not a tradition. It has grown up very recently.

Let us return to the top four schools supplying pupils to the Scottish universities: Eton college, Wellington college, Charterhouse and Westminster school. I say gently to my old and honourable Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that the amendments that he declared publicly that he will support tonight will help students in Eton but not in Elgin, in Wellington but not in Wallacetown, in Charterhouse but not in Chapelhall, and in Westminster but not in West Lothian. That fact should be borne in mind as the debate proceeds.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the Minister accept that the perception—which is held both domestically and internationally—that there is fairness and non-discrimination in the United Kingdom is not bogus? If so, how can the Government justify requiring students from Northern Ireland, England and Wales to pay £1,000 more than students from Europe? How can they justify requiring students from Northern Ireland to expend £1,000 more than students from the Irish Republic? Although I take account of the fact that there is provision for those on the lowest incomes, I am concerned that those who are just outside those bands will be greatly disadvantaged.

Mr. Wilson: In a moment, I shall deal with the European point—which, superficially, seems to be anomalous—and seek to address it.

First, however, I point out to the hon. Member for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs) that it is not only the poorest who will pay no fees. As a rule of thumb, as a norm, fees will not be paid by those with household incomes below £23,000. Moreover, for those who pay, the fees required will not leap suddenly from nothing to £1,000 a year. There will be a graduated scale, and one will have to be fairly far up in the earnings league before having to pay the full £1,000.

I stress again that anyone from Northern Ireland, like those from elsewhere, who has made the choice of doing a Scottish honours degree course—many do, and they are all extremely welcome—will take fees into account as one of a range of factors. I repeat also that people will not automatically be required to pay an additional £1,000 a year; it is a £1,000 maximum over a period of four years.

As I said—I think it was before the hon. Member for East Antrim joined the debate, but I make no point of that—there have always been extra costs. Any student from Northern Ireland who decides to do a four-year honours degree in Scotland instead of a three-year honours degree elsewhere knows that there will be an extra year of maintenance costs and a year of income forgone. He or she will take all those factors into account in making a decision.

I should like to point out one aspect of the Lords amendments that all hon. Members should understand. It is quite true that it would cost £2 million annually to meet the fees of all fourth-year students on Scottish courses from England, Wales and Northern Ireland. The sum can be dismissed as a relatively small one—although the principle, rather than the sum, is important. However, I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House understand that the Lords amendments would go much further and make the same provision for all United Kingdom students on four-year degree courses at institutions across the United Kingdom. Such provision would cost more than 10 times as much—about £27 million annually.

We would not have that £27 million available to put into higher education. Any hon. Member planning to vote today for the Lords amendments should do so in the full knowledge that £27 million would be taken from higher education. Where would that money go instead? It would, by definition, go to the best-off people, who would be the only ones who were required to contribute towards their children's tuition fees at the full £1,000 level. That subsidy would mean that, each and every year, there would be £27 million less in public funds for universities and colleges. The cost is significant.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): The Minister is dealing with an important issue. He has admitted that the £2 million that it would cost to exempt students attending Scottish universities is a moderate sum. The basis of his argument—which has changed very rapidly, and was made clear last week by the Prime Minister at Prime Minister's questions—is that the sum required to exempt more students from fees for four-year courses would cost the Government £27 million. The analysis that we have had done by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals of the Universities of the United Kingdom, which I think the Minister will agree is a reliable body and not one that panders to the Liberal Democrats, is that it would cost around £12 million, and that the Government have not discounted the tuition fees at all but presume that every student will pay £1,000 and the Government will meet that cost. That clearly is not the case, so will the Minister give an analysis of where the £27 million has suddenly come from?

Mr. Wilson: The £27 million comes proportionately from the number of students in England who are doing four-year degree courses. I have tried to break down the number affected in Scotland, and that is what would be covered by roughly £2 million, but incrementally there is a far larger number. As I understand it—this is not within my territory, but it is something that has grown up over the years—there is a much more substantial number of students doing four-year degree courses in England than perhaps had been widely appreciated, and certainly many more than are doing them in Scotland.

Mr. Willis: There are 50,000.

Mr. Wilson: I am not quite sure how the hon. Gentleman gets a multiplier that takes him to 250,000. As I said, it is 10 times more in England than in Scotland in terms of cost.

Mr. Willis rose—

Mr. Wilson: I am happy to correspond with the hon. Gentleman if he wants to pursue the point of detail. Incidentally—

Mr. Willis: This is a serious point.

Mr. Wilson: I recognise that it is a serious point, and I shall perhaps answer it when I wind up the debate. I do not dismiss it. I point out in passing that the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals was among those who supported the introduction of tuition fees as a necessary method of getting extra money into higher education.

This debate has been largely about Scottish courses. If it were self-contained, it would be an interesting debate, but different from the one that we are having tonight. The secretary of the Committee of Scottish Higher Education Principals wrote a letter to The Scotsman last week. He was totally dismissive of and not interested in the £27 million argument—that is for someone else to worry about. He wrote:

"Why does it requite comment by the English Department for Education and Employment to defend a decision which palpably discriminates against the Scottish way of doing things?"

He went on to dismiss with an airy wave of the hand four-year degree courses in England which, he said:

"cannot be regarded as authentic higher education at all and certainly not comparable with the first year of Scotland's distinctive four-year degree with honours."

I do not have the luxury of saying that I do not care about these folk in England doing four-year degree courses because the degrees are not worth anything. That is a ridiculous thing to say. The Government are obliged to take account of the fact that there is a UK-wide effect from the cost of this, and that the argument that prevails in Scotland is exactly the one that should prevail in the rest of the United Kingdom. In other words, it is a Unionist argument again, as opposed to a divisive one.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The Minister suggested that, if the issue were the £2 million that it would cost to allow English, Welsh and Northern Ireland students to study a four-year honours course at a Scottish university, therefore providing comparability, that would be a different argument. If the House accepts the Government motion, and the other place were then to vote for an amendment that would restrict it to the change that cost £2 million, what would the Government's attitude be?

Mr. Wilson: I think that I was entitled to draw it to the attention of the House that that is not what the amendment says. Anyone who is going to vote for the amendment had better understand what it says. Hypothesising about what the Lords might do is not particularly productive.

It is important to get this clear on the record: I did not say that it would be a different argument. I said that it would be an interesting debate; but it is not the one that we are having, because we are debating the amendments before us. The case for the Scottish £2 million, if you like, is founded on an educational argument as well as a financial one, which is, quite simply, that there is not a neatly interlocking set of school qualifications from England and the other parts of the United Kingdom which fit into the four-year honours degree system in Scotland. That is an educational argument; it is an argument recognised by Dearing; and it is the argument on which we found our case tonight.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): The Minister implies that the Scottish first-year course is little more than a remedial year to bring Scottish highers students up to A-level standard. That is an outrageous argument.

9 pm

Mr. Wilson: If it were a remedial year, the hon. Gentleman could probably benefit from it. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should be left to his own devices, as I said no such thing. I quoted the secretary of the Committee of Scottish Higher Education Principals saying that the first year of a course in England could not be regarded as higher education. He was referring to England, not Scotland. I said nothing remotely resembling what the hon. Gentleman has attributed to me. The cost is significant, but the principle is equally important.

I now turn to the European dimension. Given my history on the issue, I found it surprising to have to explain to some unlikely people what devolution and subsidiarity are about and the consequences that flow from having different systems in respect of health, education and so on in different parts of the United Kingdom. Long before political devolution, Scotland has had a distinctive and different education system. In other parts of Europe, there are variations between Lander, regions and provinces, and it is clear that differences can develop within states on the basis of devolved government and administration. The simple principle that, in my view, rightly operates within the European Union is that, if citizens of other EU countries come to a part of a fellow member state—be it a region or a devolved territory—they benefit from whatever system applies within that area. However, for exactly the reasons that I have explained, EU law does not provide that internal concessions must be granted throughout the state.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): On the basis of equity, will the Minister advise the House of the position of a German national who has a parental home in or whose normal place of residence is in England in relation to attendance at a Scottish university? Will he be expected to pay the extra year's tuition fees; if so, can the Minister explain to the House whether he should be treated on the same basis as an English student?

Mr. Wilson: We have all had such constituency cases at one time or another. They have to be dealt with according to their individual circumstances. It would depend on how long the individual had been resident in England and a range of other circumstances. I encounter such cases fairly frequently, as I am sure my ministerial colleagues do in England. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to draw a specific case to their attention, I am sure that my ministerial colleagues will be pleased to give him an answer.

Although the European position sounds anomalous, it is not. It applies throughout the European Union. It is the product of a union of states within which there are various forms of government and different legislatures.

Mr. Beggs: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way to me again.

The Minister will be aware that, today, the New Northern Ireland Assembly has had its first meeting; arising from it will be cross-border bodies, and much co-operation is expected. Nevertheless, there will be discrimination between students from Northern Ireland and from the Irish Republic should they be studying at Scottish universities. There will also be the council of the isles; should it make a representation to the Minister asking for equity of treatment for students from all regions within the United Kingdom, would he accept and honour such a recommendation?

Mr. Wilson: I shall not prejudge what the council of the isles might discuss. However, before anyone recommends the system in the Republic of Ireland, they should check on the availability of student grants to the great majority of students. They should also check on the availability of student loans, which do not exist at all there. As a result, the majority of students within the Republic of Ireland have access to neither grants nor loans from the state, and that is not a desirable system for Scotland or Northern Ireland to copy.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): Will the Minister clarify the means-testing of the fee for students from other parts of the European Union? What mechanisms has he arranged with other member states and what are the administrative costs likely to be?

Mr. Wilson: Those students do not have access to maintenance grants or loans.

Mrs. Browning: I am asking about fees.

Mr. Wilson: If I misunderstood the hon. Lady's point, I shall deal with it later.

The spectre of hordes of European Union students coming in while the English are deprived is held up as the great problem. Students from the rest of the European Union will not benefit from the subsidised maintenance loans which will be available to students from England, Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland.

Mr. Willetts rose—

Mr. Wilson: I shall not give way because I am coming to a conclusion.

The idea that European Union students will flock to Scottish universities in place of UK students is absurd. In 1995-96, there were just 350 other EU students in the fourth year of a Scottish course. This year there has been a 17 per cent. fall on last year's number of EU applicants, which is greater than the percentage fall in the overall number of applicants. The EU treaty requires member states not to discriminate on the ground of nationality against nationals of other member states on matters in the scope of the treaty, but it does not require each member state to treat all its nationals in the same way. That is what devolution and subsidiarity are about. I find it odd that the principles should be attacked by people who otherwise support them.

I do not want to detain the House further. This is an interesting debate, but it is peripheral to the main issues.

Mr. Wallace: There are two motions for debate. The second says:

"That this House insists on its amendment in page 22, to leave out lines 31 to 39, to which the Lords have disagreed."

That specifically relates to English, Welsh and Northern Ireland students attending Scottish higher education institutions. The Minister said that that might be a different debate, but it is relevant to the amendments. What will be the Government's policy if there is a separate vote on that motion?

Mr. Wilson: I may be dreaming, but I think that I answered that question five minutes ago. I said that it was a different debate, but the same principle. We have made it clear from the start that we oppose extending the provision to students from the rest of the United Kingdom, not primarily—or not entirely—on financial grounds. There is an educational argument. We believe that it is not right to extend that benefit to students who have chosen a degree course in Scotland against the many other options open to them. We do not believe that it will have any impact on the number of English students in Scottish universities. I reiterate the point that, if any Scottish university is worried about not having enough students from England, it need only take a few students from less well-off backgrounds. That will keep the numbers and the quality up.

Mr. Beggs: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Wilson: No. I have given way twice to the hon. Gentleman.

We are debating a peripheral aspect of the Bill. The Bill is about getting more money into higher education, putting £140 million extra a year into Scottish higher and further education alone. That is a big aim. The quality of our education system depends on it. If we are frustrated or diverted from our aim, it will not be this House that pays the penalty, but the students of the next generation, the research base of the Scottish universities and, in particular, those universities that depend on the widest possible range of students and the widest range of access to their ranks. For all those reasons, I ask my hon. Friends and Opposition Members who think about the issues to vote to overturn the Lords amendments. As we would expect from the House of Lords, the amendments are in the interests of an elite and do not address the needs of higher education.

Mr. Willetts: The longer the Minister's speech went on, the feebler his arguments became. It was a completely unnecessary speech, on a completely unnecessary measure. The Government have got what they asked for when the Secretary of State for Education and Employment made his statement on higher education almost a year ago. In every essential respect, the Bill before the House delivers what he announced. It is not the purpose of this debate to go into the strong disagreements in Committee—suffice it to say that the Secretary of State has got what he announced last July.

This debate is about something that was not announced in July. To be honest, I do not believe that Ministers ever intended to get themselves into such a position. I do not believe that any of the Ministers sitting on the Front Bench said in a Whitehall ministerial meeting, "I've had a bright idea. Why don't we charge more for students from England, Wales and Northern Ireland if they go to Scotland than we charge those who live in Scotland?" No Minister came up with such an idea. Whatever I may think of the ministerial team, I do not believe that they would be quite that daft.

I do not believe that a second Minister then chipped in, saying: "I've an even better idea. Why don't we exempt students from fourth-year fees if they come from the rest of Europe but not if they come from England, Wales or Northern Ireland?" We are debating not a policy, but an accident as a result of the failure of Ministers in the Scottish Office and the Department for Education and Employment to get their act together as they were developing higher education policy.

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): Will the hon. Gentleman explain why the policy is an accident, given that the exemption for four-year degree courses was part of the Denning recommendations, and that that noble Lord still supports what he recommended?

Mr. Willetts: That noble Lord is dead. The hon. Gentleman may be referring to Lord Dearing. I am, of course, familiar with the arguments in the Dearing report. Following comments on exemption for tuition fees, the very final sentence of the Dearing report on this subject states:

"Beyond that, this would be a matter for consideration by the Secretary of State for Scotland."

That was an open invitation to the Secretary of State for Scotland to consider making arrangements so that we would not get into the anomalous position in which Ministers have landed themselves. I should be interested in whether the Minister wished to deny at the Dispatch Box that, as I believe, Scottish Office Ministers have prepared in their budget a contingency plan for the £2 million that will be necessary to deal with the anomaly. That is what Lord Dearing invited them to do.

Let us consider briefly in turn—I shall certainly not speak for the same length of time as the Minister—some of the unbelievably convoluted and complicated arguments that have been put before the House in this debate, and earlier today, by the Prime Minister in Prime Minister's Question Time. First, let us turn to the figures on university applications.

Last week, the Prime Minister told us in Prime Minister's Question Time:

"the number of English students applying to Scottish universities is up, not down. It is actually 33,000."—[Official Report, 24 June 1998; Vol. 314, c. 1047.]

Unusually, the Prime Minister apologised in today's Question Time for getting that wrong. It was simply incorrect; the figures clearly show that applications to Scottish universities from English students are down by 4.1 per cent.

Then we heard an even more ingenious argument. We were told that, although applications to Scottish universities from English students have fallen, it does not matter, because overall applications to Scottish universities have fallen by even more. I should not have thought that that is something that anyone would want to celebrate. In racing down to the bottom, which is the best that Ministers can come up with, they tell us that such a fall does not matter, because the overall figure has fallen by 5.4 per cent.

The statement by the Universities and Colleges Admission Service of 12 June gives its figures. They indeed show a fall of 4.1 per cent. in applications to Scottish universities from English students, and an overall fall—in students from Scotland, the rest of the United Kingdom and the rest of the European Union—of 4.5 per cent. Why is that? A fall of 30.3 per cent. in applications to Scottish universities from students in Eire has brought down the average.

The Prime Minister said that such wider changes were irrelevant to the policy; they are not. Applications from Eire have fallen by 30 per cent. because it has just got rid of tuition fees, and more students in the Republic of Ireland are staying at Irish universities. To claim that phenomenon as the explanation or defence of what the Government are trying to do is to pile distortion on distortion.

Miss Melanie Johnson (Welwyn Hatfield): The hon. Gentleman neglected to mention the figures for Wales, which show a 4.5 per cent. increase in applications. I invite his comments on the point, which was made by the Minister, that the figures are for applications, which fill places many times over. All we are arguing about is the massive over-subscription for places. Spending more money on those limited places for the few people occupying them, rather than on a larger number of students, will only increase the number of unsuccessful applicants and reduce the number of those who are able to attend universities and complete the degree courses.

9.15 pm

Mr. Willetts: That was equal to about three interventions. The figure for Wales, which I have here, of an increase of about 40 in applications, is trivial compared with the problem of a fall in applications from England and, as Northern Ireland Members have mentioned, from Northern Ireland.

Mr. Beggs: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the position with applications from Northern Ireland is even more serious, because of the absence of adequate university provision within Northern Ireland? Many of our able youngsters, who could compete favourably with others at Scottish universities, may lose completely.

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Gentleman is correct, and, although the Minister seemed rather uncertain about this idea, he is talking about a well-established tradition, under which many students from Northern Ireland have gone to Scottish universities, partly because of historic links between the two countries. As the hon. Gentleman pointed out—

Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: I want to make more progress. I shall finish this point.

The tradition is attributable also to the absence of sufficient higher education provision in Northern Ireland.

In the text surrounding its figures, UCAS said:

"Institutions in Scotland, where honours degrees are traditionally four years long, continue to be affected by the introduction of tuition fees."

That is a perfectly obvious and comprehensible point, and I do not understand the attempts to create ever more confusion about it.

Mr. Murphy: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: No, I want to move on to a different point. I shall not speak for as long as the Minister did.

The other argument we hear is about the treatment of European students. Whatever ingenious arguments the Minister tries to put before the House tonight, he does not have a reasonable prospect of sustaining this policy through the European courts in the months and years ahead. The idea that the European Court of Justice will not interfere in a manifestly discriminatory policy comes from cloud cuckoo land. He would be much better off finding the £2 million necessary to concede the point now, rather than being hauled through the courts in future.

Mr. David Jamieson (Plymouth, Devonport): The figure is £27 million.

Mr. Willetts: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that remark, which is the next point that I should like briefly to consider. When the Minister has run out of all the ingenious and intricate claims he has made tonight, the one argument that remains is that we are on a slippery slope, that this is the thin end of the wedge—we all know the Whitehall arguments—and that the cost would be not £2 million, but £27 million.

The figures from the House of Commons Library—and, indeed, from Ministers themselves in written answers—are absolutely clear. The cost of exempting students from England from fourth-year tuition fees in Scotland would be £1.5 million; for students from Wales the cost would be £45,000, and for students from Northern Ireland it would be £550,000. That is the cost of dealing with the anomaly that we are debating tonight. The anomaly is one in which two students born in different countries of the United Kingdom, going to the same Scottish university, will face different levels of tuition fees simply because of where they were born. What we are talking about is what goes on within a Scottish university. That is the point at issue tonight.

Mr. Wilson: From what the hon. Gentleman says, am I right to conclude that he would not support the extension of the same concession to four-year degree courses in England; and, if so, will he vote for the Lords amendment, which envisages exactly that happening?

Mr. Willetts: The Lords amendments are permissive—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."]—they put no obligation on Ministers in either the Department for Education and Employment or the Scottish Office to spend £27 million. All they require is that, at any given university, students who come from different parts of the United Kingdom should be treated on the same basis for tuition fees.

I quite accept that at St. Andrews and at Edinburgh university there is an historic different way of delivering higher education from that at English universities. We are not saying that students at English universities should be exempt from fourth-year tuition fees—we accept that, at £27 million, that would be too expensive. All we are asking is that students from different parts of the United Kingdom going to the same university should be treated on the same basis. That is why dealing with the anomaly would cost only £2 million, not £27 million.

Mr. Willis: There are two amendments for debate tonight, and we would hope to have two separate votes, if that is necessary. The second of the amendments, which refers to page 22, lines 31 to 39, is very specific. It deals specifically with students from England, Wales and Northern Ireland going to Scottish universities. It is bogus of the Minister to claim otherwise. That debate is at the heart of our deliberations this evening.

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Gentleman is quite correct. What we are talking about is the regime in Scottish universities, which is what the amendment tabled in another place to which he refers is all about.

Mr. Wilson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: Yes, although the Minister did not accept my second intervention, so I am treating him better than he treated me.

Mr. Wilson: I had more competition facing me than the hon. Gentleman has. He makes a fundamental point and it seems to me that we could abandon proceedings now. He is simply wrong when he says that the amendments are permissive—they are not. The Lords amendment in lieu of Commons amendment No. 64 states clearly:

> "Regulations under this section shall ensure that any arrangements for the payment of grant in respect of tuition fees for the fourth or any subsequent year of study at a higher education institution in England or Wales apply equally to a student whose parental home or normal place of residence", and so on and so forth. It is not permissive. As the hon. Gentleman appears to have renounced the meaning and the spirit of the amendment on which we shall vote later, I wonder what we are debating.

Mr. Willetts: This is very interesting. If the Minister is going to tell the House that he will accept the motion that specifically covers students from England, Wales and Northern Ireland in Scottish universities for a cost of £2 million, the Opposition will happily accept that. That is the anomaly about which my hon. Friends and I are complaining. There is not a complaint in Bristol—

Mr. Wilson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is essential for the House to know whether the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) is moving the Lords amendment in lieu of Commons amendment No. 64, given that he has renounced its content.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion before the House has been properly moved. That is a debating point, not a point of order.

Mr. Willetts: It is the Minister who is moving the motions to tonight. My point is that we are not imagining, claiming or demanding that students in English universities should be exempted from fourth-year tuition fees; we are saying simply that, when students from different parts of the United Kingdom are studying side by side at Scottish universities, they should all be treated on the same basis. That is the point, that is the anomaly and that is what the argument is about. There have not been protests in England about this matter; it concerns the Scottish universities.

Mr. Jim Murphy: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: No, I must conclude now.

[Mr. Willetts]

The motion is about establishing that there should be equal treatment of English, Northern Irish and Welsh students at a university in Scotland. If all that the Minister can do is to offer us evermore ingenious and intricate arguments for something that no reasonable man would defend, that is the beginnings of the decay of a Government when Whitehall arguments triumph over practical common sense.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Perhaps it was inadvertent, but the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman seemed to kill off the noble Lord Denning, who I am told is in fact alive and flourishing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the House will be glad to hear that.

Mr. Donald Gorrie (Edinburgh, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Public Bill Office agrees with my interpretation of the Lords amendment that the House is seeking to overturn, which is different from the Minister's understanding. The hon. Gentleman was trying to say that the Lords amendment—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order for the Chair. The hon. Gentleman is extending the debate.

Mr. Willetts: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to extend my gratitude for the correction, and my apologies to Lord Denning.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's apology will be noted.

Dr. George Turner: The slip of my tongue was certainly outdone by the slip of the dagger on the Opposition Benches. First, I must briefly remind the House that among Sassenachs, because of Scottish ancestry, I have a warm spot in my heart for a number of Scottish traditions.

Mr. Willis: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise to the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) for interrupting, but this matter is germane to the whole debate. There is a difference of opinion between the Government and both Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen about interpretation. Can you ask for an official interpretation of the amendment?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is for Ministers to explain to the House the motion that is before it.

Dr. Turner: When the House last discussed the issue, I at least understood the emotional content of some of the debate. If I did not understand where the arguments appeared to have come from, certainly the politics seemed straightforward. The politics of the Opposition are that they will lay their hands on anything, even if it means abandoning the principles that they have argued elsewhere on the Bill, to find something that can be represented as the Government being unfair.

As the noble Lord Dearing explained last week that equity was the motivation behind his committee proposing the exemption for Scottish students attending Scottish universities, I find it difficult to understand why a party that says that it wants to implement the Dearing proposals will argue against them when it suits their political purposes.

After many years spent as a university teacher and admissions officer, and in being involved with course design work, particularly for courses that allowed students to join in different years and which tried to encourage applications from Europe and further afield, I know that one must face many issues when considering the merits of three and four-year courses.

When I first joined the university system many years ago, the word "elitist" could rightly have been used to describe the attitude of many in higher education who believed that they had some right to a level of funding and support that was but a dream for those in further education, particularly those at our schools. I know from my political experience of the changes that took place in the universities. In the name of efficiency, they were forced to impose unacceptably low unit costs to meet what I believe was the admirable objective of an increase in the numbers of students.

However, as a member of a local education committee, I saw that that had to be balanced against the many funding needs of the local education authority, which were unmet almost every year—in my county of Norfolk, three and four-year-old nursery provision was non-existent, and almost all sixth-form provision received inadequate funding.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Like the hon. Gentleman, I was a member of a local education authority for many years. He seems to be saying that there was an imbalance between the resources for higher education and those for schools and nurseries, so is he arguing that, for 18 years, the previous Government funded universities too generously?

9.30 pm

Dr. Turner: I said that I saw an inequity. There was an elitist attitude in the universities—when I joined the university system, only a tiny minority of people were able to go to universities, which meant that there was less funding to support those who were unable to go to them. The nation faces a challenge in trying to strike the right balance between supporting those who are unable to go to university because they have failed at an earlier stage and the aspirations of those who are already at university.

I spent many years in university circles, and I know that many people in English universities want the four-year course to be the norm. Indeed, it would be good to think that, in the next millennium, the nation could afford a standard honours course that lasted four years, as that would allow for a relaxation in what can be an intense pace of study.

I have to ask myself whether that is the priority that I want to support as a Member of Parliament. I believe that better funding for—not the extension and relaxation of—what we already do should be our highest priority; we cannot afford the luxury of four-year courses as the norm in these isles before we have improved the quality of three-year courses and opened the doors of our universities and further education institutions to larger numbers of pupils. If hon. Members do not recognise that the argument is about priorities, they are missing the point.

Mr. Dalyell: Will my hon. Friend clarify whether his argument is that the Scottish four-year course should be ended, or have I misunderstood?

Dr. Turner: My hon. Friend misunderstands me. As I said at the outset, to avoid misunderstanding, I have an automatic, even genetic, sympathy with the Scottish system. However, that system is fundamentally different from the English system. One may regard it as superior or inferior, but the truth is that it is fundamentally different. People can create false anomalies only because we are trying to match the needs of two different systems and of those who want to transfer between them.

Mr. Randall: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Turner: I must make some progress, as I know that other hon. Members want to speak.

The fundamental question that Dearing and the Government have had to face is why four-year courses in Scotland are treated differently from the four-year courses that exist in England. If that had been the subject of this debate, I could have understood that those who represent the Scottish interest had an argument. I know enough about Scotland to be aware that significant numbers—it used to be the majority—of pupils move from school to university after one year of post-compulsory school education.

I know that the pattern has shifted and that many now do a further round of highers, but a large number of pupils in Scotland start their four-year degree course after only one year at highers, as opposed to the two years at A-level enjoyed by the vast majority of English pupils as the standard—although by no means the only—route into English universities.

A comparison between the number who flow north of the border and the number who come south shows that the real difficulties arise in transferring into England after one year post-16 in Scotland. Some of the English four-year courses allow that transition, because they are structured for those who want to change subjects.

The Dearing inquiry had to consider whether an exception should be made for Scottish universities' four-year courses because of the significant number of students who would be seen to be treated inequitably if they were required to pay for all four years. Because the inquiry saw that that would be unfair to that majority, or large minority, of students in Scotland, it recommended an exclusion for Scottish students, who would have only the same number of years of post-compulsory schooling as their English counterparts, who had two years at A-level and three for a standard university course.

Mrs. Browning: If what the hon. Gentleman says about the situation in Scotland, England, Wales and Northern Ireland is the case, what is the justification for the exemption for Holland, Germany, Italy, Belgium, France, Portugal, Spain and all the other European Union countries? Are they all being exempted for exactly the same reason, or have the Government received rather different advice about their actions in relation to those countries?

Dr. Turner: I know that the Conservative party is obsessed with all matters European, and I believe that that was an arid debating point, with which the Minister has already dealt completely adequately. The hon. Lady may tempt me to speak for longer than I had intended. That dreadful nationalistic approach, which does not recognise the difference between this country and Europe, has divided her party and done it no good whatever.

It is important to realise—I hope that Scottish Members are listening carefully—that the Government erred on the side of generosity to Scotland. I was tempted to raise this issue when these measures last came to the House, and I will resist no longer. The Government have taken a principled exemption, designed to allow those students in Scotland who had done only one year of post-compulsory education at school to pay for only three years of fees, and extended it to all students in Scotland, so that those students who take two years and do a further round of highers are also exempt.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine): It is important to realise that it is not only a matter of the number of years at school and university, because often the first year of the subject that you study at university will be crucial to your degree and not relevant to what you studied in your two years in the sixth form. Say you studied law, medicine or—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The hon. Gentleman should know that it is highly unlikely that I will be studying law or any other subject.

Dr. Turner: It would be nice if we could afford to allow everyone to do whatever they wanted and to have unco-ordinated career patterns, switching to any course at any time. Some time in the next millennium, we will no doubt be able to have perpetual students who never make up their mind about what they want to do. My question is whether the Government can afford to give greater priority—

Mr. Willis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Turner: I need to make some progress with my argument. I want to make sure that the House clearly understands that the Government have erred in favour of Scottish students and Scottish universities. Will the Minister explain why the Government have been so generous to Scottish universities?

Mr. Willis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Turner: I will, as the hon. Gentleman is so insistent.

Mr. Willis: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I know that he was in full flow, but I am trying to help him. He seems to be saying that, because students in Scotland leave school a year earlier than their English counterparts, they deserve an additional year's exemption.

[Mr. Willis]

Can he tell me why a domiciled Scottish student who wants to study medicine or veterinary science will receive no exemption?

Dr. Turner: As I said, the trouble with exemptions is that, once those in authority embark on them, they have to justify not going one step further. The Government need to be pinned down on why they have made the exemption at all. That is the real question that needs to be answered, and I hope to hear a clear answer from the Minister.

The Minister has said—I believe that the figures given by his counterpart in the House of Lords bear this out—that the extra cost is about 5 per cent. of the total that might be involved. Supporting a four-year course will involve many costs to the state. As I said at the outset, I believe that, when fundamentally different systems are operating, an element of judgment must feature in the granting of exemptions to take account of those fundamental differences.

I think it reasonable to exempt Scottish students, because of the fundamentally different system under which they are educated in and after school; but I see no reason why someone from northern England, for example, should be able to cross the border to do a four-year course and benefit from an exemption from which he or she could not benefit at the university at which I studied in England. The Opposition want to create an anomaly: they want an English student taking a four-year course in Scotland to be treated differently from an English student taking a four-year course in England. I see no reason for that, and I think that the Government should stick firmly to the opposite principle.

I have read the report of the debate in the other place. The Opposition there seemed not to be learned and erudite, or to know what they were talking about; their views seemed to be based on the same party political principles as the views that we are hearing tonight. I hope that the amendments will be thrown out.

Mr. Wallace: I hope that I will be forgiven if I do not follow the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) down all the byways of his speech, since I was not entirely sure where he was going.

The Minister's introductory speech astounded me. I had already thought that the Government's arguments were pretty threadbare, but the longer the Minister went on, the more threadbare they became. That has been the character of the Government's position throughout the debate. The hollowness of their arguments has been matched only by their obstinate unwillingness to admit that they are wrong, and that the simplest thing to do would be to accept the Lords amendments, particularly the one dealing specifically with Scottish institutions.

9.45 pm

I mentioned the Government's arguments. No great battery of arguments has been fired against us, however; instead, the Government have had to put up successive arguments, because almost every argument that they have made has been shot down. When the policy was first announced, the Minister thought that he could destroy his critics and win the day by sheer bluster. He described his critics as indulging in "hyperbolic nonsense". He criticised those who defended extra fees for defending the "rich English". The Minister likes to pride himself on being the scourge of the Nats, but if that remark had come from the Scottish National party, I can just imagine his outcry against such a nationalistic act. There were further echoes of that statement in the Minister's attempted defence of the Government's position tonight.

Having failed with that argument, the Government attempted to use misleading figures. I would be ruled out of order, and would not argue, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I said that the Minister had used lies or damned lies, but "Erskine May" allows me to say that he used statistics. As the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) has pointed out, it was totally misleading to say that the proportion of students applying to Scottish universities from England was down by less than the total drop in applications. The point being made was about the substantial reduction in student applications from the Republic of Ireland, whose students are not coming to Scotland because Irish tuition fees have been abolished. The Minister also ignored important points about students who come to Scotland from Northern Ireland for long-standing traditional reasons. The number coming from Northern Ireland is down about 5.5 per cent. The overall figure is 4.5 per cent. As the hon. Member for Havant said, the Universities and Colleges Admission Service explained that with reference to the introduction of tuition fees.

Mr. Jim Murphy: I have listened with interest to the point made by both the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) about students from Northern Ireland. Applications to Scottish and other United Kingdom universities from Northern Ireland have gone down. The hon. Gentleman claims that that was caused by tuition fees. If that is so, how can he explain the 15 per cent. reduction in the number of Northern Irish students going to colleges and universities in the Republic of Ireland over a two-year period? His figures do not add up. There has been a drop of 4 to 5 per cent. in applications from Northern Ireland to the UK, but a drop of 15 per cent. of applications from Northern Ireland to the Republic, despite its abolition of fees.

Mr. Wallace: I will not explain why students have not gone to the Republic of Ireland, although they would not get loans if they did so. However, almost 380 fewer students have applied from Northern Ireland to Scottish universities, which is a significant drop over last year's figure. The hon. Gentleman cannot just wish that away by making comparisons with applications to the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Hayes: Of the Northern Irish students who go to Scottish universities, more than three quarters are from state schools. We heard no description from the Minister of the schools in Northern Ireland when he gave his sociological breakdown; he chose to dwell solely on England in his analysis.

Mr. Wallace: I noted that point. The Minister was keen to read out Eton, Wellington and dear knows where else, but he failed significantly to respond to queries on the schools attended by Northern Irish students who went to Scottish universities.

Other arguments have been used. In the other place, Lord Sewel said that the Bill compensated Scottish students who went to university aged 17 after only one year of post-statutory school age education. That is simply factually wrong. It is a long time since I was at school but only two of my fellow pupils left at the end of fifth year. The rest of us went to university at the end of sixth year. When I heard that argument from the Government, I thought that there had been a sea change but in fact only 7.4 per cent. of 17-year-olds in Scotland were in higher education institutions in 1995. The argument does not stack up.

Lord Sewel advanced another argument. He tried to say that the first year at Scottish university was there to make up for the alleged lack of depth achieved with a one-year or two-term higher. Apart from being patronising to the Scottish education system, that ignores the fact that the distinctiveness of the Scottish education system lies in its breadth and quality. That point has been used to justify another weak prop of the Government's argument.

The Government say that students from England, Wales and Northern Ireland can skip the first year of Scottish degree courses and go straight into the second year, thereby avoiding a year's worth of fees. That does not meet the test of critical examination. Less than 12 per cent. of students from England, Wales and Northern Ireland go straight into the second year of courses in Scottish universities. It was previously only 6 per cent. for England and 7 per cent. each for Wales and Northern Ireland. The numbers were decreasing. The Government's argument ignores the fact that many subjects, such as law, engineering and psychology cannot be done at school, so the first year is necessary. That argument does not stack up either. Second-year entrants miss out on the opportunity to study the extra subjects that they could have studied in the first year.

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes): Does the hon. and learned Gentleman accept that applications from England for entry in the second year of Scottish university courses have doubled, which totally destroys his argument?

Mr. Wallace: That makes rather than destroys my argument, because the trend was down. It is under the pressure of the Government's policy that the figure has tumbled. Unfortunately, the hon. Lady cannot see it.

The fear is that linked to these measures is the systematic undermining of the Scottish four-year degree course. The Minister, who is no longer with us, has said that he wants the advanced higher to be on a par with A-levels. In a letter to me this week he said that he looks forward to similar advanced entry for Scottish pupils who had taken the advanced higher. He wrote:

"Where institutions make offers of credit or advanced standing for holders of A levels, Advanced Higher students should be given similar recognition."

Mr. Swayne: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wallace: I want to make progress. There is widespread concern that what underlies the proposal is the systematic undermining of the traditional, broad-based, four-year Scottish honours course.

The Government's most ludicrous argument is that they are acting in this way because it helps to emphasise the distinctiveness of the Scottish education system.

Mr. Welsh: I am amazed at what the hon. and learned Gentleman says. He makes an important point by illustrating what a mess the Government's policy is in. They cannot even implement "higher still", never mind the advanced higher. They have got their education policy, both at schools and universities, into a complete mess.

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Gentleman knows that we agree. "Higher still" implementation has been appalling. When the advanced higher was first mooted, the understanding was that it would proceed on a broad base, but now we are talking of people taking only two or three advanced highers, making the examinations similar to A-levels—just when people in English education have been looking at the breadth of the Scottish education system.

For the Minister to argue that what the Government are doing emphasises the distinctiveness of the Scottish system, and that we will have such so-called anomalies with devolution, misses the point. The distinctiveness will not be based on the system but on domicile, and a limited domicile at that because the arrangements apply only to people living in England, Wales or Northern Ireland. The proposals are nothing to do with the system. The problem is made worse by the fact that students from Umbria are exempted whereas students from Cumbria are not. The Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells), may groan, but he will have cause to groan even more. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is too much noise in the House.

Mr. Wallace: As my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) said, there could be a legal challenge to the Government. My noble Friend Earl Russell was told in another place that the Government were confident that they were right. This evening, the Minister told us that he had taken legal advice. Of course, we know that the Government take legal advice. The Labour party in Scotland took legal advice when it tried to remove the lord provost of Glasgow, and look what happened then. So we know the quality of advice—

Mr. Jim Murphy rose—

Mr. Wallace: I am not going to take any advice from the hon. Gentleman. It is probably no better than the last lot he gave me and probably no better than the advice that the Government were given on this matter.

Some distinguished professors of educational law have raised a serious point. Under the European convention on human rights, there may well be challenges to the Government's position on this matter.

My final point relates to cost. The point has been made tonight that the amendments would cost some £27 million. The first amendment makes no such commitment. All that it says is that there cannot be discrimination between

[Mr. Wallace]

Scottish and Northern Irish students who attend English and Welsh institutions. The second amendment relates only to making a level playing field for English, Welsh and Northern Irish residents who come to Scottish universities. The Minister has accepted that the cost of that is only £2 million. That is £2 million that will not kick in until 2001—the fourth year of courses starting this year under the present system. I do not believe that the Government could not find £2 million in the next three years.

Dr. George Turner: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wallace: No, the hon. Gentleman had a fair say.

In his report, Garrick referred to comparable qualifications elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): I did not realise, until the hon. and learned Gentleman said it a few moments ago, that the requirement to find £2 million would not apply until 2001—the fourth year of honours courses starting this year. By that time, there will be a Scottish Parliament, which will be responsible for the funding of higher education. It could be that the Scottish Parliament will overturn the decision of the House tonight when it really matters.

Mr. Wallace: That is obviously the case. Perhaps people will be sufficiently enlightened to find the £2 million.

Mr. Jim Murphy: I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for giving way. If I have the opportunity to speak, I will give way to him. On the issue of the Scottish Parliament, the hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell), writing in the alumni association magazine of St. Andrews university, said:

"There will never be unlimited resources for Higher Education. The Scottish Parliament won't change this. It is also unlikely that the proportion of expenditure on Higher Education within the total education budget will increase."

Those are the words of his hon. and learned Friend, in whose constituency the university is. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman disagree with his hon. and learned Friend on that point?

Mr. Wallace: It is self-evident that the Scottish Parliament will not suddenly be able to make unlimited funds available for higher education. No one has pretended otherwise. However, the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) pointed out that the Scottish Parliament might well be able to find £2 million to ensure that English, Welsh and Northern Irish students can still come to Scottish universities and study on an equal basis for an honours degree. That is something that the hon. Gentleman and his party are not willing to do because they have such a mean-minded attitude. They realised early on that they had it wrong, and they do not have the guts or the courage to admit it. Perhaps in the remaining minutes and hours of this debate, they can see the light. There is joy in heaven over sinners that repent.

Mr. Canavan: I wish to make it clear at the outset that I am against all tuition fees. There was no mention of them in the Labour party manifesto, and during the general election campaign, the Prime Minister specifically said that Labour had no plans to introduce tuition fees. Whatever justification the Government may try to come up with for tuition fees in general, there surely can be no justification for the anomaly whereby one student at a Scottish university has to pay £3,000 in tuition fees, whereas another student in the same class doing the same course at the same university with the same parental financial circumstances has to pay £1,000 more. Ministers try to justify the unjustifiable when they say that there is some justice and equity in that. The net result will be a disincentive for many students from England, Wales and Northern Ireland to go to Scottish universities.

When the matter was previously debated, we were repeatedly told that there was no evidence for that. There is evidence—UCAS produced statistics, unfortunately just a few days after the previous debate on the subject. They clearly show that applications to Scottish universities are down by 4.5 per cent., that applications from England to Scottish universities are down by 4.1 per cent. and that those from Northern Ireland are down by 5.5 per cent.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the Teaching and Higher Education Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

Question agreed to.

Lords amendment again considered.

Mr. Canavan: For some universities, the situation is even bleaker. In the past week, my capable researcher telephoned some universities and has produced some interesting statistics. For example, applications to Aberdeen university from England are down by 6 per cent. Applications from England and Wales to Dundee university are down by 13 per cent. and those from Northern Ireland are down by 22 per cent. Applications to Glasgow Caledonian from England are down by 13 per cent. Applications to Robert Gordon university from England are down by 39.4 per cent. Those from Wales are down by 47.6 per cent. and those from Northern Ireland are down by 5.45 per cent. At Strathclyde university, applications from England are down by 14 per cent.

If that trend continues, there is a genuine and justifiable fear for the viability of some of the four-year honours courses and the Scottish tradition of a broad-based education.

Mr. Swayne: Can the hon. Gentleman not see that there is an agenda here? The statement that A-level students and advanced students from England can enter at the second year contains the inevitable implication that the first year is remedial. That is the death knell for the distinctive Scottish four-year degree system.

Mr. Canavan: I would never describe the first year of a four-year honours degree course as remedial, but Scottish universities fear that if the trends in the statistics that I have quoted continue, there could be a long-term threat to the viability of the four-year honours course.

Mr. Jim Murphy: I should like to query two of my hon. Friend's points. I do not in any way wish to cast aspersions on the ability of his researcher. However, the Minister gave figures that are not in dispute when he spoke about a drop of 4 to 5 per cent. in applications from England to Scottish institutions. My hon. Friend has spoken about drops of 12 to 25 per cent. In which institutions have applications gone up, and do my hon. Friend's figures add up? His aggregate seems to be 12 to 25 per cent., but the actual figure is 5 per cent.

Mr. Canavan: My hon. Friend can get his own research team to prepare his speeches. I have quoted the work of my researcher, whom I trust very much.

The fear for the future of the four-year honours course at Scottish universities was exacerbated by the Minister in the previous debate on the issue. He said:

"For some people, three-year degrees are right, and they are wasting their time doing six years at school and four years at university. I do not accept the idea that to maintain some bogus tradition, it is inherently better to spend 10 years at that stage of one's life in education than eight or nine years."—[Official Report, 8 June 1998; Vol. 313, c. 794.]

I appreciate that the Minister of State re-explained his remarks tonight, and that may be helpful. However, his use of the phrase "bogus tradition" in the previous debate caused deep offence in many Scottish universities.

I heard Ministers and hon. Members saying that students from England can go straight into the second year. That may be possible in some cases, for some individuals and for some courses, but it is not universally applicable. I have also heard Ministers say that Scots students go to university a year earlier than their English counterparts.

I heard the Prime Minister insinuating that this afternoon. He, of course, has some experience of Scottish education. He was educated at Fettes college, which is not exactly a typical Scottish comprehensive school; it is more like an English public school. He was nevertheless correct to draw a distinction between Scottish highers and English A-levels. Because Scottish pupils normally sit their highers in the fifth year, some have university entrance qualifications after five years' secondary education. Therefore, it is true that many Scottish students have university entrance qualifications at an earlier age than their English counterparts, but that does not necessarily mean that they go to university a year earlier.

I think of my experience, for example, both as a pupil and as a teacher. I left school at the age of 15 with university entrance qualifications. I was not particularly bright; it was just that I was kicked out of primary school a year early because the teachers were probably fed up with me asking too many awkward questions. I left school at 15, but I did not immediately go to university and, in retrospect, I am glad that I did not.

Later, when I was a teacher, many pupils—not just a few—aged 16 and 17 had university entrance qualifications after five years of study at secondary school, but, in general, my advice to them was to stay on at school for a further year and to do the certificate of sixth-year studies before going to university, because that sixth year would give them the chance to mature, to develop a habit of independent study and to do all the other things that help young people to make a success at university and in later life. However, my fear now is that the financial implications of the abolition of maintenance grants and the imposition of tuition fees will mean that some potential students may not go to university at all, and that others may, because of financial circumstances, go too early for their own good.

I come to the cost of the amendment. During the debate in the other place, the Minister seemed to pluck out of thin air this figure of £27 million. I do not think that it was mentioned in this House during the previous debate. Obviously, the civil servants have been working hard to try to justify the Government's stance in the other place, and that figure of £27 million was repeated by the Prime Minister last week—it is the amount required to meet the fees for all United Kingdom students on the fourth year of degree courses, at all universities throughout the UK.

That is not, with respect, comparing like with like. In England, a four-year degree course is exceptional, but in Scotland the four-year honours degree is the norm, rather than the exception. Besides, the Government's proposal will not cause a situation in any college or university in England, Wales or Northern Ireland whereby students from some parts of the UK have to pay more than students from another part, so the Scottish anomaly is unique. I understand that there is some difference of opinion about the technicality of the amendments and so on, but there would be a broad welcome if the Government were to give a signal that they would consider the uniqueness of the Scottish anomaly and think again.

About 3,500 non-Scottish UK students are in the final year of four-year honours courses at Scottish universities. If they were all paying full fees, the cost to the Treasury of getting rid of the anomaly would be £3.5 million. However, if we assume that, as the Government keep telling us, 30 or 40 per cent. of students are exempt from fees, and that another 30 per cent. pay only partial fees, the total cost would be about £2 million—as I said in the previous debate. I am pleased that the Government have since confirmed that figure as a fair estimate.

The cost would of course be split between three Departments—the Department for Education and Employment, the Welsh Office and the Northern Ireland Office. I fail to understand why my hon. Friend the Minister of State has drawn the short straw, by being lumbered with the responsibility of trying to explain the Government's policy. It would have been more appropriate for Ministers from the Department for Education and Employment, the Welsh Office and the Northern Ireland Office to try to justify the policy. My hon. Friend—to give him his due—said fairly early, even before the Bill was published, that he would ensure that the Scottish Office paid the final-year fees for students domiciled in Scotland. I do not know why his counterparts in the other Departments cannot do the same for students from south of the border, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Miss Melanie Johnson: This is a very interesting argument, and I should be interested to hear my hon. Friend's comments on this. If he is arguing that English students should have their fourth year at a Scottish university paid for—I understand that argument very well—what does he say about Scottish students attending English universities? Does he believe that they, too, should have their fourth year paid for—even if they are doing a three-year course? Whichever way one looks at the matter, in either direction, is there not an anomaly?

Mr. Canavan: I thought that I had already dealt with that point. I said that the four-year honours course in

[Mr. Canavan]

Scotland is the norm rather than the exception, whereas four-year honours courses in England are not the norm. A Scottish student who attends university in England—whether it is for four years or whatever—will pay exactly the same fees as his or her counterpart from England, Wales or Northern Ireland, whereas a student from England attending a Scottish university will have to pay more than his or her Scottish counterpart. That inequity creates the—

Miss Johnson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Canavan: No. I have dealt with the point twice already, and I shall not go on repeating myself.

The Minister seemed to argue that the main beneficiaries of the Lords amendment will be students from well-off backgrounds. He came out with some alleged facts about students from places such as Eton, Harrow, Winchester and Wellington at Edinburgh university. I wondered about that. I certainly do not recall that, while I was at Edinburgh university in the 1960s, there were huge numbers of public school boys or public school girls in my class. I got the impression that there were more working-class students with wellington boots than upper-class wallies from Wellington school. I should have thought that, in this day and age, Edinburgh university and St. Andrews university would be even more egalitarian.

Mr. Jim Murphy: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Canavan: No, I have already given way to my hon. Friend.

Even if it is true that well-off students will benefit most from a Government concession, that is equally true of the original concession—on students domiciled in Scotland—which was announced so generously by my hon. Friend the Minister.

Mr. Murphy: It is not true.

Mr. Canavan: We are asking only for equity. It is true.

Mr. Murphy: It is not true.

Mr. Canavan: It is true. If the hon. Gentleman cannot see that, he should go back to school—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Murphy) must be quiet. He does not stand a very good chance of being called to speak in the debate if he continues with sedentary interventions.

Mr. Canavan: It is a nonsense to claim that only rich students, or students from rich families, will be paying fees. Most students will have to pay fees in whole or in part. Anyone with a residual income of £16,000 per annum or more will have to pay some fees—and £16,000 per annum is not exactly filthy rich. I fail to understand the argument that it is only students from rich backgrounds who will benefit from the Lords amendment. I cannot understand why the Government are behaving in such an intransigent and apparently arrogant way. It is not good enough for Ministers to say that the House of Lords is in favour of the amendment and the Tory party is in favour of the amendment, so we ought to be against it. That is knee-jerk reaction politics at its worst.

10.15 pm

Let us look at the merits of the amendment, rather than the source of the amendment. [Interruption.] I am glad that my hon. Friend the Minister agrees with me. I can remember that not all that long ago, my hon. Friend was on the same side as the Tory party and the House of Lords when he helped to destroy the last Labour Government's proposals to set up a Scottish Parliament. Anyway, I do not want to go into that at this time of night—and I want to abolish the House of Lords completely and have no second Chamber at all, whether through heredity or patronage. In fact, I believe that the abuse of patronage might be even worse than heredity, but I do not want to go into that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It does not matter whether the hon. Gentleman wants to go into that, because we have a different motion before us.

Mr. Canavan: In conclusion, it is rather ironic that on this issue even the reactionary House of Lords takes a more enlightened view than the Government. I am sure that if we were given a free vote in this House, this House would be like minded. I therefore appeal to hon. Members to consider the merits of the case.

If the House accepted the Lords amendment, we would be doing the Government a great favour, by saving them from the embarrassment of an almost certain defeat in the European Court of Justice. I have been informed that a Member of the European Parliament has already complained to the European Commission and has demanded that the Commission look into this discriminatory matter of tuition fees to see whether any European directives have been contravened. Even if the existing European directives have not been contravened in the opinion of the Commission, it would of course be open to any individual to take a test case to the European Court of Justice.

I appeal to my hon. Friend the Minister: surely it should not require court action to convince the Government to think again. The previous Government suffered the humiliation of one court defeat after another, and we do not want to have to go through that, either in the courts in this country or in the courts of the European Union.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): I shared many teaching experiences with the hon. Gentleman. Does he agree that the Government might find themselves having to pay legal bills amounting to more than the £2 million that he mentioned earlier?

Mr. Canavan: I am grateful to my hon.—I almost said "my hon. Friend". I mean my former honourable teaching colleague, but she is my honourable friend in the sense of the teaching profession because she and I taught in the same very good school. I am grateful to her for her intervention. The £2 million is surely a very modest sum in the context of total Government expenditure.

If a student from France, Germany or Italy pays the same as a Scottish student because France, Germany and Italy are in the European Union, surely students from England, Wales and Northern Ireland are entitled to the same treatment because they are also in the European Union. It is a simple matter of equity and justice. I urge the Government, even at the 11th hour, to do the honourable thing and ensure a fairer deal for all students who choose to study at Scottish universities.

Mr. Boswell: Perhaps for the first time in my political experience, I very much endorse the remarks of the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan). I speak as a former Minister responsible for higher education, with a residual and somewhat obsolescent knowledge of the regulations. I concentrate on those rather than the wider issues of justice, as I believe that the Government are skating on very thin legal ice. I have no precise legal expertise in these matters, but I am convinced by my experience that they should reconsider their decision.

Like their predecessors since the 1980s, the Government are constrained by the Gravier judgment, which prohibits discrimination against students from the European Union or the European economic area in respect of tuition fees. In other words, if most UK domestic students are currently exempted from tuition fees by mandatory awards, the same facility must be available to European students.

I am interested in the argument that I believe the Government are deploying—that the judgment applies only in a single-market sense, in that it prevents artificial distinctions between citizens of different member states, but is silent on whether a Government may discriminate between citizens of their own state, as is happening tonight.

I am slightly surprised that the Government have not fallen back on the argument that universities are private institutions that are not formally or strictly absolutely obliged to charge fees, although of course the system is set up so that they must do so. Perhaps it is arguable that universities discriminating in their fees policies might themselves risk legal challenge. Beyond that, it is extremely unlikely that any court would not look beneath the surface at the reality behind the legislation. It is legal thin ice indeed.

Even if Gravier applies only at the macro level, between citizens of member states, it is arguable whether the Government can sustain discrimination between citizens of different parts of the United Kingdom. It is one thing to charge fees on the basis of the institution and to require that all those studying there should be subject to the same regime, just as those who live in a particular place are liable to the taxes that apply there. In this case however, the question whether fees are charged will be determined by an entirely contingent factor—where the student happens to live. There is no basis within a single state—the United Kingdom—for discrimination along those lines. I suspect that such discrimination would be under direct attack through the European convention on human rights and probably also through the European Court of Justice, in respect of any British citizen who happened to live south of the border.

The Minister of State conspicuously failed to answer the point that I put to him in an intervention, in respect of the position of a student who is a national of another EU country, but happens to have a parental home or a normal place of residence in England, Wales or Northern Ireland. The Minister said that it was a normal administrative matter and that it would be a matter of determining whether that student would be exempt from Scottish fees or treated as an English student for that purpose. Either way, the Government would be in severe difficulty. If they decided that a German student resident in Carlisle or Bolton should be treated as a Scottish student as he was attending a Scottish university, and exempted him from fourth-year fees, it would then be arguable that an English student attending a Scottish university should also benefit from that decision. If they decided that such a person were an honorary Englishman although he was a German national, how would they reconcile that decision with the Gravier judgment? I do not think that they could do it. They have either to act in a hybrid manner in English law, by treating two residents of England in different ways, or they have to break the principles of the European Union.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Boswell: I fear that I shall not, as I want to conclude in two minutes' time.

The Minister said that he was relatively unconcerned about this minor matter, which he sought to minimise. I do not believe that he would claim to have come into politics to allow discrimination or unfairness on the grounds that it was peripheral or minor. One case of discrimination or unfairness would be not only a legal affront, but politically unacceptable.

I am also concerned that if the anomaly persists, it will drive a wedge between the English and Scottish university systems, to their mutual detriment. Before that happens, if the Government persist in their petty little proposals and if the House is not prepared to reject them, the Government will go down in the courts and even the petty little saving that they seek will not be available. The whole matter will be swept up in legal fees and recriminations, which they could easily have avoided.

Mr. Jim Murphy: I am pleased to participate in the debate. I believe that I am the most recent scholar of a Scottish university in the House, although I am happy to be corrected if another hon. Member has different information.

Ms Sandra Osborne (Ayr): Me.

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend suggests that she might beat my record, but until half-past 2 in the morning of 2 May last year, I was a student at Strathclyde university. Only my election to this place interrupted that study.

Ms Osborne: I stand corrected.

Mr. Murphy: I understand that I have only a few moments, but I shall allow the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) to intervene if he wants, as I said earlier.

Claims have been made by hon. Members on both sides that supporting the Lords amendment would in some way challenge elitism. I do not believe that the votes of hereditary peers in the House of Lords represent a move towards the end of elitism. I fail to understand why such a significant number of hereditary Tory peers got so excited over a small number of students. I guess that if we were dealing with 2,000 or 3,000 students who were not from better-off backgrounds in the greater public schools of England, the hereditary peers in the House of Lords would not be so overly exercised. I am not comfortable with that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) suggested that there was no difference between the social make-up of Scottish students at Scottish universities and those from England. That is not correct. Some 48 per cent. of students from Scotland studying in Scottish universities are from skilled backgrounds, whereas 73 per cent. of English students studying at Scottish universities are. I am not proud of the additional fact that only 1 per cent. of English students studying at Scottish universities come from unskilled working-class backgrounds. I have nothing against that 1 per cent. The figure should be higher, but we need to reform our education system lower down to achieve that. I do not believe that the Government, with their emphasis on providing opportunities for many more people, should provide a subsidy to the 1 per cent. who want to study at Scottish universities.

Mr. Hayes rose—

Mr. Murphy: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman, but time is not an ally.

There are income thresholds throughout the system. If English students wants to study in a Scottish university, good luck to them. I wish them well. I shared that experience with many colleagues and friends at Strathclyde university. We are saying simply that there should be an income test and an examination of an individual's ability to pay.

Between 5,000 and 6,000 English students studied at Scottish universities in 1996. When one discounts the 10 per cent. who will not study an honours degree, the one third who will not have to pay any fees whatever and the many other facts and figures, one is left with about 2,000 students paying £1,000 over four years. That works out to be less than 69p for each day's study at a Scottish university. If the individual comes from a family earning £35,000 a year or more, I think that they can afford the price of a can of Irn Bru and a Daily Record.

10.30 pm

Mr. Donald Gorrie (Edinburgh, West): I would like the Minister to clarify one or two points. Does he agree that the Lords amendments in no way suggest removing fourth-year fees from all universities in England? If so, his argument about the £28 million is totally irrelevant. Will he clarify whether the Lords amendments propose a level playing field in Scotland, so that the English, Welsh and Irish will not pay more than the Scots, and propose a level playing field in England, so that the Scots will not benefit and will pay fourth-year fees like anyone else?

Will the Minister clarify whether the fees will at all help the universities financially? As I understand it, grants to universities fall commensurately as the fees go up. So, there will be no increase in the universities' revenues, merely assistance to the Treasury. Will the Minister favour us with his knowledge of which Scottish university principals are in favour of the Labour proposal, as he implied? [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I appeal to the House once again to come to order. It is bad manners to conduct private conversations while an hon. Member is addressing the House. The hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) is having a conversation just now. She should not be doing that.

Mr. Gorrie: The Minister pleads in support of his argument the whole cause of devolution. Devolution and diversity represent the right and the excellence of different systems in different parts of the United Kingdom; a Scottish course may be different from an English, Welsh or Irish course. The Minister is not proposing such diversity. He is proposing that students from different parts of the United Kingdom, who are in the same lecture hall, taking the same course, be treated differently. That is not diversity; that is gross unfairness.

The Minister tried to defend his line on bogus tradition by the fact that there had been a recent increase in the number of students taking honours as opposed to ordinary degrees. Does he agree that there is a long Scottish tradition—of 250 or 300 years—of a breadth of education which has been developed in different ways in different courses?

The first year of the four-year degree is an absolutely critical part of that strong tradition. People who went straight into the second year would miss that. In addition, most Scottish courses do not allow people to enter in the second year. There is much evidence from universities that students who do so go back to the first year because they cannot make it, or give up altogether. Often, going straight into the second year is not clever.

The Minister delivered his litany about how we would not help students in Elgin or West Lothian if we pursued the amendment—but we would. It is in the interests of students from Elgin, West Lothian and other parts of the Scotland that there are viable first-year courses in Scottish universities. His measures will undermine that. We would be supporting future opportunities in Scottish universities.

The Minister is busy promoting a cause of "higher still", which will mean that more Scottish students stay on to the sixth form. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) made it clear that the argument that all Scots go from the fifth year into university is complete rubbish. The Minister's arguments are totally flawed, and he should give way gracefully.

Mr. Welsh: I congratulate the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) on his speech in which we heard the true, honest voice of what used to be the Labour party. He read out the early statistical effects of the policy—a very damning educational ragman's roll—which was created and implemented by the Government and will have cumulative effects on Scottish education.

Tonight the House again has an opportunity to resolve the anomaly whereby Scottish and European Union students at Scottish universities will have their fourth-year tuition fees paid, but non-Scottish resident UK students will not. The Scottish National party has from the start highlighted that flaw, among others, in the Government's higher education policy. After asking a series of parliamentary questions, I secured an Adjournment debate on the subject in January. Since then, hon. Members from all parties and a majority in another place have joined me in my opposition to the Government's policy.

The Government's proposal is nothing short of discrimination against English, Welsh and Northern Irish students for no other reason than nationality. In The Scotsman newspaper today, it was again suggested that this policy contravenes the European convention on human rights and that the Government could be challenged under European law.

In a written answer, the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells), said:

"The EC Treaty requires Member States not to discriminate on grounds of nationality against nationals of other Member States, on matters within the scope of the Treaty. However, EC law does not intervene in internal matters and requires each Member State to treat all its own nationals in exactly the same way."—[Official Report, 1 December 1997; Vol. 302, c. 10.]

In other words, because European law does not prevent the Government from discriminating against their own citizens on the ground of nationality, the Government can do as they please. Following that logic, the Government could justify apartheid to themselves, if to no one else.

The policy is not only unfair to students from other parts of the United Kingdom; it will have adverse effects on Scottish institutions, Scottish education and the wider Scottish economy. English, Welsh and Northern Irish students will be deterred from coming to Scotland. Already, applications from the rest of the UK are down by 4.5 per cent. Some Scottish universities, such as Dundee and Abertay, have seen a substantial drop in applications, particularly from Northern Ireland. The final result of the Government's policy will not be known until the autumn when the more important admissions figures will be released.

Any drop in numbers of students from other parts of the United Kingdom will force Scottish institutions to downsize their diverse range of courses. There is also the danger that Scottish universities will be forced to consider abandoning the four-year honours degree and replacing it with a three-year course, so as to compete on a level playing field to attract non-Scottish resident UK students. Universities are being forced to redesign courses to suit second-year entrants for financial, not educational or academic, reasons.

The broad-based four-year degree is gaining admiration and popularity in other countries. Yet the Minister for Education and Industry has disgracefully described it as a bogus tradition. University is not and should never be a case of simply rushing people through and giving them a certificate at the end. It is a learning process and should be treated as such.

The policy will have economic repercussions, causing a reduction in the £210 million spent in Scotland each year by students from other parts of the UK.

Through written questions, I have secured pledges from the Scottish Office, the Department for Education and Employment and the Northern Ireland Office that they will monitor the effects of tuition fees and this anomaly on student numbers. I ask the Minister for an assurance that if there is any substantial drop in the number of English, Welsh or Northern Irish entrants to Scottish institutions this autumn, fourth-year fees for such students will be at least immediately reviewed and at best waived. I seek guarantees that the Government will monitor their policy and take action if it proves to be deleterious, as many of us fear it will be.

The Government must listen, not only to the views expressed tonight by hon. Members on both sides, but to the voice of students, lecturers and principals. The Government's policy is opposed by the Association of University Teachers, the National Union of Students, the Scottish Ancients, the Committee of Scottish Higher Education Principals and the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals of the Universities of the United Kingdom. The Government are on their own. The new Labour Government think that they know better, but if they are so confident of the wisdom of their policy and the strength of their argument, why will they not trust their own Members of Parliament to support them and allow a free vote tonight? We can be sure that they will not do that.

The Scottish Minister is left without credibility on this issue. He says that he is widening choice, but he is, in fact, restricting student choice. He says that he wants to follow the Dearing report, in his own words, "to the letter", but he is not so doing. Tonight, he praises the four-year honours degree, having previously called it a "bogus tradition". Faced with a 4.5 per cent. drop in non-Scottish UK students, he is reduced to semantics about percentages. All we have heard from the Minister is debating tricks and vitriol, which cannot disguise the weakness of his DFEE colleagues who have let him down in respect of their policy. The tuition fees policy is simply discriminatory. It is unnecessary and it could easily be remedied if there were any willingness in other Government Departments to do something about it.

The Labour Government have got it wrong. For a limited cost, the English, Welsh and Northern Irish education departments could sort out the anomaly, restore fairness and end this blatant discrimination against English, Welsh and Northern Irish students at Scottish universities. The Government should do that and, for their failure to act, they will rightly be judged.

Mr. Dalyell: May we hark back to the persistent, pertinent, but unanswered questions put by the hon. Member for East Antrim (Mr. Beggs)? It is part of the business of the House of Commons to think policies through, and I want, first, to ask a direct question of my hon. Friend the Minister. What happens in court when a student from Belfast—they are a litigious lot there—decides to take court action in relation to that student from Dublin who is paying £1,000 less? That is not a possibility whipped out of the air; as certain as certain can be, there will be legal action. When I interrupted his opening speech, my hon. Friend the Minister said, "I would not be at the Dispatch Box unless all those things had been taken care of," but I fear that I have experience of too many Ministers of different parties going to the Dispatch Box and saying, "Yes, we are legally watertight—all is well," and, some time later—usually sooner rather than later—coming back, with the proverbial egg on their face. I repeat the question: what is the legal advice?

The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), a former Minister with responsibility for higher education, knows very well that there is massive Government lawyer legal advice available to any Minister. Are we to take it that that advice has not been forthcoming? Either it has not been forthcoming, or the House of Commons deserves to be told tonight what that advice is. Many of us, from different angles, think that we are going to get into great difficulty with the European, and possibly the UK, courts. Will the Minister say something about that?

Secondly, on the question of elitism, 30 per cent. of the students at Heriot-Watt come from England. That is not elitism—it is a very real problem for the Scottish universities. Thirdly, among many letters that I have received is one from a Labour party member in Kirkby Lonsdale, Mrs. Rodd, who says:

"What infuriates many people is the obvious injustice of someone from Bordeaux or Brussels paying the Scottish rate, but those from Berwick or beyond to the south on this island, being alienated by this discriminatory fee practice. This is to say nothing of the effect on the universities themselves and the stoking up of the separatist movement that this sort of action is fuelling."

That is the view of a prominent Labour party member from the north of England. How are we supposed to answer that?

The hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Welsh) alluded to a number of organisations, including the Association of University Teachers. The last paragraph of a letter that it sent to all Scottish Members of Parliament states:

"Scotland will be the poorer if English, Welsh and Northern Irish students are discouraged from attending our traditionally culturally diverse universities. It cannot be right that a student from Carlisle should be treated significantly worse than a student from Cologne when studying in Scotland and we ask that Scottish MPs reconsider this issue and vote against the Government amendment, which we hope, even at this late stage, may be withdrawn."

That is the considered view of the AUT.

10.45 pm

Finally, as I see the Whip looking at his watch, I should like to say that I was taught by the late Aneurin Bevan, as were many of my generation, that one should always take the strongest argument against one. In this case, it is the figure of £27 million. I put that case to Stewart Sutherland, vice-chancellor of the university of Edinburgh, for a considered opinion, which was this:

"The main counter-argument to parity of treatment for all UK students studying in Scotland is that the cost would be far greater than the estimated £2 million. It is argued that the thin end of the Scottish wedge would lead to an increase in the number of students on four-year courses in England. This surely is a matter on which the Secretary of State's advice and"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have told the hon. Gentleman on previous occasions that I do not want him to read letters from outside organisations in full. He knows how to paraphrase a letter better than I do, so I hope that he will not get into the practice of reading them into the record.

Mr. Dalyell: I would disagree with you on only one thing, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that is that I could do that better than you. I am sure that you would do it better.

The gist of the letter is that the vice-chancellor of the university of Edinburgh, who has some say in the matter, is convinced, along with his colleagues—I think that he is speaking for the vice-chancellors—that we should reflect carefully before going ahead.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): At the end of this debate, there is only one real question left: what was the exact mixture of incompetence, malice and pig-headedness that put the Government in their current hole? Just look at the coalition that is assembled against them. It is not merely my right hon. and hon. Friends, but the Liberal Democrats, the nationalists, the Cross-Bench peers and men and women of principle on the Labour Benches.

Outside this House, the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, the Scottish universities and the National Union of Students are all lined up against the Government. Outside the Government ranks, no one thinks that their policy is fair and right.

The reason for such an all-embracing coalition opposing the Government is richly illustrated by the appalling mess that the Prime Minister and other Ministers have got themselves into when trying to argue that the measure is not making Scottish universities less attractive. First, the Minister says that applications are down; secondly, the Prime Minister says that they are up; thirdly, the Prime Minister says that, when he said up, he meant down, but not down as much as other applications. Truly, that is Orwellian; it is "Nineteen Eighty-Four", new Labour newspeak—up means down and black means white.

Behind that—whether one believes what the Minister said last week, what the Prime Minister said last week, or what the Prime Minister said this week—there is even greater confusion. When I asked the Department for Education and Employment for its projected application figures, the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells), said that the Department did not publish them. When asked a straight question, the Government answers "Yes," "No," and "We do not know." Any student applying to a Scottish university will have to do better than that.

It is important to nail some myths that the Government have propagated this evening. The first is that their policy is having no effect on applications. The Universities and Colleges Admission Service has said that applications from England to Scottish universities are 4.1 per cent. down on last year. The trend has been steadily rising, but it is now going down because of the Government's policy.

Let me nail another myth—that English students can easily, after A-levels, pick up a Scottish course in the second year. There are various problems with that, not least the fact that they do not and cannot. Last year, 8 per cent. of English students at Scottish universities started their courses in the second year. The Association of University Teachers has said that, even at that manageable level, anecdotal evidence from its members and from students shows that many students find the transition too difficult and either drop down into the first year or have to retake the second year. The idea that English students are sufficiently capable to swan in in the second year without needing the four-year course is completely at variance with the facts.

Even if it were true that English students could easily begin the course in the second year, that assumes that English students will all have done A-levels. From a Government who are supposed to be encouraging vocational qualifications and different types of learning, that assumption is particularly perverse. What about students from other European countries, many of which also have completely different education systems? Why are those students entitled to privileges that students from England, Wales and Northern Ireland do not have?

The Minister was reduced to complete absurdity when he tried to defend the policy on the "World At One". He was asked why a youngster from France would pay £3,000 when a youngster from England would pay £4,000. "Ah," said the Minister, "it's because France is in the European Union"—to which the interviewer responded: "Isn't England?" That sums up the Government's confusion as well as anything.

Among the opposition that is clear, concise and principled is that from the National Union of Students. I pay tribute to the current leadership, because it consists of that increasingly rare breed—independent-minded Labour politicians. I dare say that many of them are ambitious to sit in the House with their Labour colleagues. Indeed, the principled Labour Members who will vote against the Government tonight should include former presidents of the NUS, of whom there are five on the Labour Benches. I ask them which way they will vote. Will the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Murphy), for example, defend the interests of students or the interests of his career?

I contrast how I suspect many of the ex-presidents of the NUS will vote with the principled stance taken by the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan). I do not want to embarrass him by complimenting him too much; I merely observe that, in return for his principles, it has been decided that he is unfit to be a Labour candidate for the Scottish Parliament. The Labour party is right in that—men and women of principle are not what it requires on its benches in the Scottish Parliament.

The Minister said that he is acting on the best legal advice. He should consider the European convention on human rights; the Human Rights Bill has not yet been enacted but, when it is, it will have a serious effect on the Government's policy.

In The Scotsman today, Dr. Dennis Farrington, a law lecturer at Stirling university and the author of "The Law of Higher Education", said that a student would be able to challenge the Government's policy through the British courts. If the lawyers are telling the Minister that everything is okay, my friendly advice to him is to go and find some new lawyers. One can always find lawyers to give a new opinion, and the advice from Government lawyers is probably wrong.

The Minister made palpable his dislike of many of the most distinguished Scottish universities. He had gone to the trouble of researching where the students came from so that he could sneer at them. It is a matter for him whether he dislikes English public schools so much that he wants to denigrate them and the students they send to Scottish universities, but if he sneers at English public schools he may end up sneering at Scottish public schools such as Fettes, which might prove disadvantageous to his career.

It is ill advised to sneer at well-off students from England but to assume that well-off students from all other countries are okay. The Minister had a go at alliteration. Why is his policy okay in Motherwell or Munich, but not in Manchester? The hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Dr. Turner) presented an extraordinary argument on Europe. He was right to say that the Scottish system is fundamentally different. That is why the Government's argument that the change would cost them £27 million, rather than the £2 million for the purely Scottish exemption, is completely spurious. The Government picked that figure of £27 million out of the air and cannot justify it in any way.

The heart of our argument is not statistical: it concerns fairness. Students from North Berwick and from Berwick-upon-Tweed should be treated on the same basis in the same universities, be they in England, Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland. Both the changes that the Lords want to make would achieve that equality—the first for students at English and Welsh universities and the second for those at Scottish universities—and would not commit the Government to that spurious £27 million.

The Government have made no case at all. Hon. Members can vote against the Government, safe in the knowledge that they are on the side of both justice and rational argument. If they have a spark of decency and a sense of fairness—whether they are old Labour, new Labour, Liberal Democrat, nationalist or Conservative—hon. Members will vote against the Government's mean-spirited little proposals.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Mr. Brian Wilson.

Mr. Wilson rose—

Mr. Swayne: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The House has already endured more than 45 minutes from the Minister. We would have expected the Secretary of State to explain this farrago. My point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I called the Minister, and the hon. Gentleman is challenging my judgment.

Mr. Wilson: The more perceptive among my colleagues may have heard generous tributes paid by Opposition spokesmen to men and women of principle on the Government Benches who will join the great coalition of Tories and nationalists in support of the House of Lords. [Interruption.] A briefing sent out by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) to Tory Back Benchers says—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not a good thing for the Chair to have to intervene, but hon. Members must be quiet when an hon. Member is addressing the House.

Mr. Wilson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) was held up as a paragon of principle by the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green). The Tory briefing says:

> "Our immediate tactics tonight are to encourage as many Labour MPs as possible to rebel against the Government. This is good politics."

Government Members are talking not about playing political games but about the proper funding of higher education, reversing the damage done by 18 years of Tory rule, and widening access to higher education. We will not be diverted by little ploys by Conservative Members.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) asked about the legal advice. I always think that, when people's arguments are in trouble, they send for the lawyers, so let me give the legal advice precisely. It is not contrary to EC law for Scottish legislation to treat students from England, Wales and Northern Ireland differently from Scottish students. That is a purely internal situation concerning United Kingdom nationals, and EC law is not concerned with such matters.

Mrs. Browning rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister is not giving way.

Mr. Wilson: I am defending the distinctiveness of the Scottish education system. I am also defending the principle of subsidiarity.

My hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West said that people with a residual income of £16,000 would pay fees, and that that was not filthy rich. I ask my hon. Friend, and other hon. Members who try to give the impression that people who cannot afford to pay fees will be asked to pay them, why they are misleading people. In the case referred to by my hon. Friend, the fees would be £50. Does my hon. Friend, or any other Member, believe that £50 over a period of four years will be the decisive factor for someone who, having taken every other factor into consideration, opts for a four-year degree course in Scotland rather than a three-year degree course elsewhere? I do not think that my hon. Friend was suggesting that, but he should not convey misleading messages about what is proposed. Indeed, no one should do so.

I know many pupils whom my hon. Friend taught. Some of them are my best friends, some went on to be very good footballers, and one is now rector of Edinburgh university. I think that my hon. Friend and I should unite on this point. In his inaugural address, the rector of Edinburgh university—my hon. Friend's former pupil, John Colquhoun—pointed to the school that, although it is within a stone's throw of the university, has never sent a single pupil to the university. Let us redress that inequality, and let us worry about access to universities.

Mr. Canavan: During our last debate on the Bill, we addressed that injustice through my amendment, which aimed to maintain grants for students from low-income families, but the Minister—and every other Minister—voted against it.

Mr. Wilson: Let me finish on that point. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] I will answer. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. MacKay, I expect better from the Front Bench.

Mr. Wilson: Let me answer directly.

The problem for the Opposition is that every statistic works against them, rather than for them. Since the introduction of student loans as a better way—in the last Government's view—of financing student maintenance, the number of students coming from England to Scotland has not decreased; it has greatly increased.

We must all review our past positions. We must all accept that numbers have risen, and that giving more money to higher education is the way to reverse the damage of 18 Tory years.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a Committee be appointed to draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to the amendment proposed by the Lords in lieu of the amendment in page 14, to leave out lines 31 to 49, and insisting on the amendments in page 14, to leave out lines 31 to 49, and page 22, to leave out lines 31 to 39.

That Mr. Damian Green, Mr. David Jamieson, Mr. Tony McNulty, Mr. Phil Willis and Mr. Brian Wilson be members of the Committee; that Mr. Brian Wilson be the Chairman of the Committee; that three be the quorum of the Committee; and that the Committee do withdraw immediately.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

11.30 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Mr. Deputy Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the right hon. Gentleman speaks, I should say that I shall be very firm in insisting that the rules of debate are observed. He may speak purely to this motion, and to this motion alone. If he deviates from the rules, I shall quickly be on my feet to remind him of them.

Mr. Forth: I would expect no less, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I assume that you would not always assume that the House would wish to nod through any motion, no matter how routine it may seem. It would therefore be useful to the House if we were to hear just a little bit more from the Government not only about the rationale for establishing the Committee—it is, after all, a debatable motion—but about the qualifications of the Committee membership, and, perhaps more specifically, about why the person suggested in the motion to serve as the Committee Chairman should be considered to be the ideal person to serve in that capacity.

It is possible that someone who might be thought to be more neutral should be appointed to serve as Chairman of the Committee, so that it might discharge its very important responsibilities in the most even-handed manner. Some reasoning for the proposed Committee membership and nomination of Chairman would be helpful to the House.

The other matter that would be worth clarifying in establishing the Committee is when the Committee might sit. In the past such Committees may well have sat immediately; I think that that is my recollection of such Committees.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman does not have to discuss that matter—the motion says "immediately".

Mr. Forth: I have a concern about that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have heard quite a lot recently about the need for the House to sit reduced hours. Some anxiety has been expressed—by no less a person than the Leader of the House herself—that late-hours sitting is good neither for the House nor for the quality of our deliberations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That has absolutely nothing to do with the motion. It is another matter, which has been put before the Leader of the House.

Mr. Forth: Mr. Deputy Speaker, you have said that the motion says that the Committee should sit immediately. I am querying that—I want to debate it—because the motion is debatable. I am seeking to enter into a debate on the advisability of the Committee meeting at this late hour, as I should be worried about the quality of the Committee's decision making if it meets at this late hour. I am setting that worry in the context of the remarks made recently by the Leader of the House. She has apparently said that she believes that the House should not sit at late hours. I assume that part of her reasoning—although we have not yet heard it in any detail—is that the House's quality of decision making might well be prejudiced if such decisions are made so late and if such Committees meet at such a late hour.

Mrs. Browning: My right hon. Friend will be aware that this debate started extremely late, as we were waiting upon the attendance of the Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already stated that what has gone before has nothing to do with the motion. I will not have a discussion entered into about previous business that has been decided.

Mr. Forth: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am looking very much to the future and to the quality of decision making in the future. Looking at the clock, I see that it is a moderately late hour, so the House may wish to consider deferring the decision or deferring the setting up of the Committee until it can deliberate in a more reasoned way at a more respectable hour. These are perfectly rational points. I raise them because, from time to time, we find that apparently innocuous motions are brought before the House—perhaps not always at an hour such as this, but at a more reasonable hour—and there is an expectation that they should simply be nodded through.

Increasingly, I find that the concept of nodding motions through is a denial of the role of the House of Commons. It would be better if we were to hear more of a case put in favour of such motions. The Government Whip told the House what he was proposing in respect of the membership of the Committee, its chairmanship and so on, but we are entitled to a more in-depth explanation.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): Is my right hon. Friend worried that if we simply nod through such motions, the credibility of the Committee's decisions will in some way be undermined in another place, and that unless we give due deliberation to the points that he has raised, in another place the Committee's decisions will not have the effect and persuasiveness that this House requires?

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making those points. He might wish to elaborate on them if he were to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. He raises those points in the context of our not having had a full explanation of the Committee's role. It would be useful if a member of the Government were to give us more of an explanation of the role envisaged for the Committee, and how it would provide a link between the proceedings of this House and the other place. Surely, that is vital to the proper progress of the business in hand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. The role of the Committee is clearly stated in the motion.

Mr. Forth: The Order Paper refers to "Consideration of a Lords Amendment in lieu of a Commons Amendment and of a Reason for disagreeing to a Commons Amendment."

That does not explain to me the role of the Committee. I should have thought that those words meant that we were considering the words spoken by the Government Whip in explaining the background to the Committee, but he did not elaborate on the nature of the role of the Committee, were it to be set up at this late hour and with the membership and Chairman that he proposed.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) rose—

Mr. Forth: I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing); then I want to conclude my remarks.

Mrs. Laing: On the point about the proposed Chairman of the Committee, given that the Reasons Committee is a Select Committee of the House, does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be more reasonable if the Chairman whom the House is about to appoint had some impartiality on the subject before the Committee? The proposed Chairman—the Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office—has shown himself to be anything but impartial.

Mr. Forth: Again, that is a very important point. It is perhaps not for me to elaborate on it at this stage. I see that my hon. Friends have given much thought to the motion—more perhaps than I have been able to. Perhaps they will want to expand on these points if they catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The House might want to reconsider the chairmanship of the Committee, to which I alluded briefly when I began, for exactly the reason that my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest has given. I am grateful to her for bringing to my attention and to that of the House the fact that the Committee would have the status of a Select Committee. That is an important new fact. Given that a number of Select Committees are chaired by people other than Labour Members or Ministers, there must surely be a strong case—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not embark on a dissertation on Select Committees. The motion before the House is very specific, and I would be grateful if he would address it.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but the Whip read out the proposed members of the Committee, including the proposed Chairman—the Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office—who took part in the debate and can hardly be described as impartial. It is just possible that, for the sake of giving the fullest credibility to the Committee, which forms a key bridge between the proceedings of the House and those of another place, the House may want to consider a different candidate for its chairmanship.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Is my right hon. Friend aware that until his present appointment, and particularly in opposition, the Minister for Education and Industry, Scottish Office had no educational appointments whatever—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Forth.

Mr. Forth: I might have guessed that the Minister had no previous educational experience, but I am grateful to my hon. Friend for confirming that.

In conclusion, the House must consider the matter seriously. We cannot take such decisions on the nod at this late hour. I am asking the Government for further elaboration—

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The right hon. Gentleman has been a Minister—albeit a bad one—and knows the rules. He knows full well that it is normal procedure to appoint a Committee of the House. It has always been that way, so why is he delaying the Bill's progress?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Mr. Forth: Indeed. I hope that the House will not accept the arrogance shown by that point, which assumes that a matter which is properly debatable can be swept to one side and taken as read and that we can proceed with business. Surely the point is that the motion is properly debatable in the House. I wish to initiate a short debate on it so that the Government can elaborate on the points that I have sought to raise. I hope that at least I will have succeeded in that.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I wish to elaborate on the point on which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) asked me to comment.

I understand that, as the Bill started in another place, if the amendments that we are asking Members of another place to consider are rejected by them and they are minded to refuse the will of this House, it could fail entirely in the current Session. It is particularly important that the constitution and credibility of the Committee is beyond reproach. If it is not, and if in another place many independent minds address themselves to the points that have been raised, the will of the House, as expressed tonight, will fail. Therefore, the points that my right hon. Friend raised are not delaying tactics; they go to the heart of the matter—whether or not the House is serious about the arguments put forward this evening; whether it is serious about trying to influence another place; and whether it seriously cares whether the Bill, which started in another place, is completed this Session.

You will advise me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I believe that we should consider whether it is material that the Bill should be completed this Session.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not what we are debating now.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My right hon. Friend has made the important point that we do not have an impartial Chairman and, given the independence of mind of those in another place, that will not help the passage of the Bill.

11.44 pm

Mr. Wilson: The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) asked why the Reasons Committee was being set up. The House has twice voted overwhelmingly to reverse Lords amendments and send business back to the Lords. As he may have gleaned during his years in the House, that is done by referring the issue to the Reasons Committee. It is the norm that the Minister who has spoken in the debate chairs the Committee. The issue is as simple as that. I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman suffers from any particular problems of comprehension. His behaviour is entirely up to him, but I suggest that the charade that he has initiated is not in anyone's interests and that we should now get on with the business of the House and appoint the Reasons Committee.

11.46 pm

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Question is—

Mr. Wilshire: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was trying to catch your eye—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We have moved on from that.

Mr. Forth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My reading of the Order Paper suggests that the matter can be debated until any hour. Although the Minister has spoken early in the debate, it should be quite proper for other hon. Members to seek to catch your eye. There is no time limit on the debate. The fact that the Minister has spoken surely cannot bring the debate to an end.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Mr. David Wilshire.

Mr. Wilshire: Are your calling me on a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or are you calling me to speak?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am calling the hon. Member to speak.

Mr. Wilshire: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am most grateful to you for giving me the opportunity to speak.

Labour Members should not believe that we are not prepared to have a constructive debate on an important matter. We have had a contribution from the Minister, but I was not clear whether he was intervening on my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) or whether my hon. Friend had finished and the Minister was making his speech. Will the Minister answer the legitimate questions that my right hon. and hon. Friends have asked and the questions that I would like to ask? I shall be happy to give way if someone would like to give me an assurance that we shall hear a constructive contribution from the Government in response to the points that have been made.

The Minister did not tell us why the particular names have been proposed. I understand why my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) is to be on the Committee, if the House approves it, but I do not understand the reasons for the selection of the other names. I should be most grateful if someone could explain why each of those hon. Members has been selected and why they are considered the experts who can draw up a list of reasons on behalf of the whole House that we can send to the other place.

I am also interested to know not only why those hon. Members have been chosen, but why others have been rejected. Many Labour Members have great knowledge of the issues that have been debated. It is important for us to be told whether those who have been chosen represent a balanced ticket.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Minister's cursory remarks will undermine the credibility of the Committee in the eyes of another place? We are seeking a more detailed response and analysis—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has already made that point more than once.

Mr. Wilshire: My hon. Friend the Member for Guildford is absolutely right. It is important that, when justification is given for the names that the Government have put forward, it is explained whether the names constitute a balanced ticket. We have heard members of all parties express substantial reservations about the arguments advanced by the Government Front-Bench team. It is important that somebody like the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) should be on that Committee, because he seems to have a much stronger grasp of the problems than the Minister or, as far as I can see, any of the other Labour Members proposed.

Mrs. Browning: My hon. Friend will be aware that I sat in the Chamber throughout the previous debates, although I did not speak. Does he believe that the hon. Members on the Committee should at the very minimum have heard tonight's debate?

Mr. Wilshire: I am sure that my hon. Friend is absolutely right. Perhaps I should add that to the list of questions, so that we may make absolutely certain that everyone who serves on the Committee has sat through the entire debate and knows about all the issues that must be addressed. I should be very grateful for an explanation about the names.

There is one other issue with which we need to deal: the Chairman. It has been asked whether the Minister for Education and Industry is the right person for the job, because he is tired. Is he tired? The poor hon. Gentlemen has been dragged all the way back from Inverness. He was late getting here, he has been under a great deal of stress, and I worry for his health. I worry that he might be clapped out and, therefore, somebody else should be chosen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the procedures that we are adopting are routine for such an issue. The reasons that he is giving for not agreeing with the motion are, as far as I can see, rather thin.

Mr. Wilshire: I understand exactly your point, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Although the matter can very easily be seen as routine, it is far from it when the person proposed to chair the Committee has been dragged back from Inverness. I suspect that this might even be a unique occasion. The matter needs some consideration. I hope that someone on the Government Front Bench will be able to assure us that a Minister who has had a tiring day and has worked hard can, just before midnight, chair a Committee that must do a responsible job. I look forward to the answer to that.

We must also be told what issues the Committee intends to address. All sorts of issues have been raised tonight. We know what the two motions and the decisions were; the Committee has to draw up reasons. We need to be reassured that the Committee members have a grasp of every issue that was raised tonight—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not what we are talking about. The hon. Member is straying very wide of the point, and I should be grateful if he returned to the precise motion before the House.

Mr. Wilshire: I entirely understand your point, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I therefore ask just one other question? We need to be told what will happen if the Committee gets it wrong. If its members have not grasped the issues, and they draw up a list of reasons—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That does not concern the motion before the House, to which the hon. Member must return precisely.

Mr. Wilshire: I thought—

Mrs. Laing: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Wilshire: Of course.

Mrs. Laing: Might my hon. Friend consider proposing—[HON. MEMBERS: "Face the Chair."] Might he consider proposing that, rather than the Chairman of the Committee being the Minister for Education and Industry—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. No, he may not. It is not possible for the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) to make such decisions.

Mr. Wilshire: I again understand your point, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to co-operate not only with you but with the entire House. My hon. Friends have asked a list of questions, to which I have added. I hope that, in the spirit of constructive debate, which we Opposition Members have observed, we shall not witness the Government ignoring the sensible points, rolling out their majority and hoping that the matter will go away. These are serious and important points and legitimate questions that the Government need to answer. I look forward to hearing what they have to say.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Nick Brown) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:—

The House proceeded to a Division—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There seems to be some delay in the No Lobby. I would be grateful if the Serjeant at Arms would investigate.

The House having divided: Ayes 269, Noes 11.

Housing Costs (Welfare Benefits)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Pope.]

12.9 am

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): I am pleased to start this short debate on housing costs and the reform of welfare benefits. The Government's review of housing benefit has been on-going for some time, and I want tonight to tease out of the Minister some suggestion of the review's likely conclusions.

My starting point is the Treasury Select Committee's report into this year's Budget. It said:

"We are concerned about the number of families remaining on a high marginal rate of tax, and hope that reviews of housing benefit and Council Tax benefit will contribute to a reduction in the incidence of high marginal rates."

That was said in the context of the new working families tax credit, which makes a significant contribution to the Budget's redistributive nature. It is a far superior benefit to the existing family credit, as it gives a greater allowance—£2.50 more than currently—for children under 11, it generously helps with child care costs and credit begins to be withdrawn at £90 rather than £79. Moreover, the rate of withdrawal of the credit for every extra £1 of net income—the so-called taper—is at 55p, rather than 70p, in the pound.

Those on housing benefit still have an overlap, whereby they face an effective rate of tax of 89 per cent. If they also receive council tax benefit, the rate is as high as 95.3 per cent. Some 260,000 families still face marginal rates of tax of more than 70 per cent., and more than 1 million families face a marginal rate of more than 60 per cent.

I welcome the Government's response—published today—to the Select Committee report. It said:

"The Government will continue to take work incentives into account in the comprehensive spending and welfare reform reviews."

It has taken the Labour Government to end marginal rates of tax of more than 100 per cent., which were shameful and endured for far too long.

I recognise that the review of housing benefit, the new working families tax credit and the comprehensive spending review will have to interact to reach a whole and satisfactory outcome. I am hopeful that, when the results of the comprehensive spending review are announced, housing will be a major beneficiary, and that there will be a welcome boost to investment in the building of more social housing and the renovation of housing of all tenures.

This debate on housing benefit reform is timely, as it falls in the shadow of the announcement of the review's results. Moreover, two significant reports have been issued this week: first, Steve Wilcox's report for the National Housing Federation, whose title is, I believe, "Unfinished Business"; and secondly, Peter Kemp's report for the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, which is called "Housing Benefit: Time for Reform".

I believe that the key objectives in housing benefit reform should be: first, to reinforce the Government's message that work pays; secondly, to support the excellent new working families tax credit; and thirdly, to avoid unrealistic demands on public spending. On the first objective, 50,000 families will be floated off housing benefit altogether through the very generous working families tax credit, which will remove them from the pernicious poverty trap—indeed, 70,000 people will also be floated off council tax benefit. Working families tax credit will help low-paid owner-occupiers as well as tenants. However, for tenants, the overlap of housing benefit still means that families are caught by high marginal tax rates—the generosity of the working families tax credit means that it will catch more people higher up the income scale. It could be said that the poverty trap becomes slightly less deep but much wider.

Working families tax credit is an exciting new support for working families, but if changes are not made to housing benefit, the two systems will continue to overlap, with high marginal tax rates well up the income scale. That confusing overlap and the high marginal rates will distort the Government's message that work pays. A harmonised system offers opportunities to deliver that message clearly, and could create savings in administration costs and reduce the scope for fraud.

Housing benefit already costs this country £12 billion a year; within a budget of that size there is scope for radical reform without extra expenditure. Helping people back to work means fewer benefit claimants and greater income tax and national insurance receipts. Helping people in work to earn higher wages means lower benefit payments and, again, greater income tax and national insurance receipts. It would be a tremendous additional benefit if a new scheme could bring help across housing tenures and end the system of poor council tenants paying what is now a total of £1.3 billion a year to help the poorest tenants with their rents.

The previous Government's shift in support from bricks and mortar to personal benefit payments went too far: so far that cuts had to be made. The local reference rent was introduced, restricting the amount of rent that was eligible for housing benefit support, as were the single room rent for under-25s, and a tight means test that hit pensioners with modest savings.

The local reference rent has already caused a 12 per cent. reduction in the number of housing benefit claimants: 130,000 people and their families with private sector tenancies no longer claim. Without reform, there is a danger that more and more people will be let down, with social exclusion increasing instead of decreasing.

There is scope for action to stem the steep rise in rents that has gone alongside the increase in the use of housing benefit to take the strain. Social housing grant rates for housing associations could be used, there could be better support for local authorities, and we could rein in the private sector consumption of public money, especially in the area of fraudulent claims.

Since 1990, the grant to housing associations for new build has reduced from 75 per cent. to 54 per cent. Rents have, of course, risen in consequence. Three quarters of all new housing association lettings of two-bedroom properties in England are at rents of more than £50 a week, and 45 per cent. are at more than £60. Seven out of every eight lettings of three-bedroom houses are at rents of more than £50 a week, and 70 per cent. at more than £60.

[Mr. David Kidney]

The Minister for Local Government and Housing wrote to the Housing Corporation in August 1997:

"I am looking for a reduction in the average level of rent charged over a 3 year period of about 4% in real terms. Rents on new schemes have now reached a level where it is questionable whether they are affordable to those in low-paid employment without assistance from HB."

The Government will have to contribute to such a commendable strategy through their decisions on social housing grant rate. If they hold it at the present 54 per cent., it could benefit tenants by £5 a week. They should especially bear in mind the argument about interest rates, which have risen over the past year, whereas they argued that the last reduction in housing association grant was partly because the rates had fallen.

An answer to a parliamentary question earlier this Session showed that the net cost of a 10 per cent. reduction in council rents was estimated at £100 million a year. That is surely a modest cost for a rent restraint that would bear directly on family concerns about moving from benefit to work. There might also be a case for trying over time to achieve a more coherent structure for council and housing association rents.

As for private lettings, I accept that there is no prospect of direct rent controls in the future, but the Government are spending a good deal of public money on buying private rented accommodation for families. Surely there ought to be some scope for using that buying power to secure localised standards in such areas as health and safety, safeguards against fraud and, perhaps, rent levels that housing benefit will support.

There are currently some good examples of public-private partnerships in housing, partly owing to the good work done by the Empty Homes Agency in prompting councils and private landlords to work together. Stafford borough council, for instance, now has very good arrangements for co-operation with all housing stakeholders. That council, along with the university accommodation office and private landlords, has a scheme for agreed standards on safety, energy efficiency and inspections of properties. For tenants who cannot afford to pay deposits, there is a rent assistance scheme, as well as fast-tracking of housing benefit applications.

Important decisions are about to be made about housing benefit. I hope that we can remove the messy overlap of scheme tapers that currently produces the worst-case poverty trap. There is a strong case for combining policies on rent restraint and benefit harmonisation. I believe that any changes should ensure that the system of support with housing costs helps those in need, eliminates fraud as far as possible, makes work pay, and supports the Government's new working families tax credit.

I hope that I have contributed to an important debate about housing costs and welfare benefit in the future.

12.21 am

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on obtaining the debate, and thank him for allowing me to speak briefly.

So far, housing has not been integrated into the new working families tax credit. The hon. Gentleman made a number of sensible and perceptive points about rent levels, and about the importance of such integration. I think that part of the reason why the tax and benefit system for low-paid workers is in such a mess is that it has developed in a piecemeal way over decades. It would be regrettable if the Government made the same mistake—if they introduced a tax credit, and then dealt with housing quite separately.

In the spirit of what the hon. Gentleman said, the Liberal Democrats—and I personally—would welcome the inclusion of rent in the working families tax credit system. For example, a £20 credit would knock £20 off the amount of rent giving eligibility for housing benefit, would reduce the number of people on housing benefit and would reduce the overlapping tapers to which the hon. Gentleman referred. It would be interesting to hear from the Minister whether the Government are thinking of such action.

The hon. Gentleman rightly said that low-paid owner-occupiers would benefit from the tax credit, but nothing in the tax credit relates explicitly to their mortgage interest costs. Earlier this week, I heard the Minister for Local Government and Housing say on the radio that she wanted building societies to provide mortgage insurance for times when such people are unemployed. That may well be laudable, and appropriate for some; but it underlines the fact that such people, when they take a job, should not suddenly lose all assistance with their mortgage costs.

If the Housing Minister is successful and unemployed people's mortgage costs are paid in full, they could amount to £400 or £500 a month. If those people then benefited from a tax credit that involves no allowance—because they are buying, and buying is the majority tenure—that would constitute a serious gap in the benefits system, and one that survey evidence suggests is a barrier to moving out of welfare and into work.

I would be grateful if the Minister could tell us whether a rental credit is likely to be included in the working families tax credit, and, more important, whether he would consider introducing an owner-occupiers' mortgage interest credit.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Keith Bradley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on obtaining the debate. It is clear from his speech that he takes a keen interest in the issues, and his speech raised a number of important matters—as did that of the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb).

The easy response to the rapidly escalating housing benefit bill of recent years would be to embark on a series of piecemeal cuts, as did the last Administration. My hon. Friend clearly identified those cuts.

That has not been our response. Instead, we have recognised the need for joined-up solutions to joined-up problems. We recognise the key interrelationship between housing benefit and the housing policy that it underpins. That is why we have embarked on a joint review with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. The first stage of that review was to put the existing scheme under the microscope to identify where the faults lay. In fact, the microscope analogy is not a good one as many of the problems are all too clear to the naked eye.

I shall concentrate my response on four main problems, but I shall carefully consider other points raised in the debate and shall respond more fully if I do not cover them tonight. First, instead of easing the transition from welfare into work, housing benefit frequently acts as an insurmountable barrier to people taking up job opportunities. Secondly, benefit recipients rarely have any shopping incentive to choose the most appropriately sized property, or to find better value housing. Thirdly, there are stark inequalities between the treatment of private and social tenants. In recent years, private sector recipients have borne the brunt of measures introduced to make savings in the escalating housing benefit bill. Finally, while some local authorities administer the benefit well, others perform badly. The resulting inconsistencies and delays compound the work incentive problem, and cause difficulties for tenants and landlords alike.

I described those as the main problems, which implies that there are others. I want to mention two: the estimated £1 billion of housing benefit lost to fraudsters every year, and widespread misunderstanding of the housing benefit system.

First, widespread fraud deflects money from the people who really need it and contributes towards the poor image that most people associate with the scheme. There can be no doubt that the present hotch-potch of rules, combined with inefficient links between the Benefits Agency and local authorities, provides a fertile breeding ground for fraud.

Secondly, the widespread misunderstanding surrounding the details of the benefit means that many claimants are simply unaware that housing benefit is payable to people in low-paid work, and that contributes to the work incentive problem that so many commentators have highlighted.

These problems are not new, but it would be wrong to continue our analysis without pausing to reflect on the good points of housing benefit. It offers a high degree of security for individuals and families. Although the British scheme has operated primarily as an instrument of income maintenance, it also enables most people to afford acceptable accommodation. Overall, however, it is easier to criticise the current scheme than to find ways of overcoming all its difficulties while still retaining the good points.

I attended the launch yesterday of "Housing Benefit: Time for Reform", a report written by Professor Peter Kemp, and of Steve Wilcox's report "Unfinished Business", both of which were mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford. I was particularly impressed by Professor Kemp's exploration not just of the problems of the current scheme but of a comprehensive range of possible solutions. His analysis of alternatives to the current scheme ranged refreshingly wide, and went beyond the deceptively simple solution of simply reducing rents.

My hon. Friend drew attention to the importance of work incentives and the part that housing benefit can play in improving them. This must be a linchpin for any reforms. We have already begun the task of changing expectations, to make sure that a welfare pension for life is not an option for those who can work.

Secondly, we have started to address the ignorance of housing benefit that prevents some people from taking up work because they are unaware of the in-work help that is available. One of the speakers at yesterday's conference highlighted the need to give tailored advice if we are ever to deal with ignorance.

The new deal has replaced the old, mass-produced benefit delivery with a more flexible, personally tailored service. Participants are given help and advice on the full range of benefits that they could claim and how much they will get when they move into employment. We have recently launched a comprehensive advertising campaign targeted at lone parents and other low-income families to highlight the full range of benefits and assistance available to people in work.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford is right to draw attention to the importance of the new working families tax credit, which was also mentioned by the hon. Member for Northavon. This, combined with other measures announced in the Budget, will increase the rewards of work. The changes already announced mean that the number of people on deduction rates of more than 90 per cent. will reduce from 130,000 to 26,000. However, a small number of tenants in receipt of housing benefit, council tax benefit and the new tax credit could still lose up to 95p in the pound of any additional earnings. There is clearly scope for improving the part that housing benefit plays in supporting low-income workers.

Some commentators suggest that integrating housing support with the new housing tax credit would "create clear water between benefit and work".

They also point out the danger of making it harder for claimants to leap between the worlds of welfare and work. It is certainly a very interesting proposal and one that has already been put to the review team, but we must strike a note of caution about creating different systems of support for tenants in and out of work. Even if a housing credit was anchored to both tenure and place of residence, it might still make life on benefits seem more secure compared with a credit that cannot be guaranteed to meet individual rent liabilities.

Giving tenants a direct stake in the cost of their housing, either through a gap scheme such as those operated in many other countries or through a notional rent contribution for council tenants, could be one way to tackle the gulf between welfare and work. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford made clear, the key message must be that work pays. All those matters will be given careful consideration.

There are finely balanced sets of pros and cons for the different schemes, and we must consider them as our reforms come forward, but reform aimed at giving tenants an interest in their rent would not take place in a vacuum. One aspect of the background canvas painted by Professor Kemp in his report is that basic social security benefits are unusual internationally in making no provision for housing cost. That is a problem that we have to continue to grapple with. We must also recognise that some vulnerable tenants may be unable to shop around or haggle with their landlords. Alternatively, the costs of giving tenants some slack to make up any rent shortfall could be substantial. There is also the danger that a gap scheme would prove to be equally complicated to run and even more opaque for claimants to understand than the current system.

That brings me to improved administration. There can be no doubt that standards of administration are patchy across local authorities. Numerous changes have been bolted on to the original scheme, leaving us with a benefit confusing even for the best local authorities to administer, let alone for claimants to understand. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford rightly said, the Public Accounts Committee report majored on the complexity of housing benefit, referring several times to the

"60 deductions, premiums, allowances and disregards"

involved in calculating entitlement. They relate largely to the structure that housing benefit shares with income support and overlook probably the biggest headache in housing benefit administration—the way that rent is assessed.

Again there is no easy solution; the complexity in the system has mostly been built in to save money, to protect tenants in vulnerable circumstances, such as young people who have been in care, or to prevent fraud and abuse. Nevertheless, the case for reducing some of the worst complexities is extremely robust. We will also continue to build on the verification framework and the findings of the benefit fraud inspectorate to disseminate good practice and to raise standards.

I should also like to address the issue of cost. Many commentators assume a backdrop of cost-cutting or restraint. If savings are to be squeezed out of the social security budget, housing benefit initially looks like a prime candidate. After all, it has shown the second fastest rate of growth after sickness and disability benefits in recent years.

Despite spending on housing remaining broadly constant, benefit spending has rocketed, from around £5.3 billion in 1988 to around £11.4 billion today. While we are aiming to restrain growth in the longer term, the review is not a cost-driven exercise. I made the same point yesterday morning at the launch of Professor Kemp's report, and a number of people in the audience immediately assumed that that was a politician's doublespeak and that I was actually on the verge of announcing cuts in housing benefit. Let me reiterate that the review is not about cuts. For the immediate future, we are more interested in streamlining the rules and in making the benefit more work-friendly.

Finally, my hon. Friend mentioned the balance between bricks and mortar and personal subsidy. I can see that this approach has its attractions, but lowering rents in the social housing sector is no panacea in itself. Rent reductions do not, for instance, increase the supply of accommodation or improve the quality and maintenance of the existing stock.

In conclusion, some of the general points are worth reiterating. There are features of the current system that go against the grain of the Government's determination to refashion a modern welfare state. In particular, housing benefit can undermine work incentives and prevent tenants from taking responsibility for housing consumption. Any changes must be designed to simplify the benefit rules, to ensure that the benefit acts in concert with other in-work support and to design out fraud wherever possible. We must always remember that many people rely on benefit for their security, and that any change will not be brought in without sensitivity, in order to ensure that existing claimants have what I call a soft landing.

I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Northavon again on their contributions to the debate. The points raised will be considered carefully as the review progresses. I hope that we can build support both for the principles of general welfare reform and for tackling the specific design faults of the housing benefit system that have been so clearly identified tonight. I am sure that, if we work together in that way, we can produce a better housing support system than the one with which we are currently grappling.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

The Minister was asked—

Cattle Ear Tagging

1. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): What representations he has received from animal welfare organisations in connection with his Department's new ear tagging arrangements for cattle. [47156]

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): The new arrangements for double tagging of cattle result from European Union, not national, rules. Welfare organisations were included in the consultations on the new arrangements.

Mr. Swayne: The Minister will be aware that the tags have to be affixed to both ears of a calf during its first week of life. For some breeds, particularly Dexters, the tags will be larger than the calf's ears. For all breeds, those tags will snag and tear the soft flesh of the ear. Will the Minister review the system and take up the matter with his European Union colleagues to obtain an electronic and more humane alternative?

Mr. Morley: The welfare issues relating to double tagging are very important. I should emphasise that the two tags do not have to be in the same ear—there can be one in each ear. We have managed to secure agreement that small breeds of cattle, such as Dexters, can wear a smaller second tag, which should take into account some of the welfare concerns. Welfare organisations and bodies such as the Dexter Cattle Society have been consulted on double tagging.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): I congratulate the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) on taking a courageous view, for a Conservative Member, on animal welfare. I welcome that revised attitude to animal welfare, and I hope that he will be as sympathetic on the subject of hunting with hounds.

Mr. Morley: Hunting with hounds is not a matter for me, but welfare issues are important. That is why we want to progress such advances as electronic tagging—trials are currently taking place and will be completed by 2000. There are a whole range of animal welfare issues, and the Government should be congratulated on their progress in improving all kinds of animal welfare.

Rabies

2. Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): When he expects to receive the report of the independent panel of scientists into alternatives to quarantine to combat rabies. [47157]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): The advisory group on quarantine is expected to report to Ministers in the summer or early autumn.

Mr. Corbett: I remind my hon. Friend that most continental European countries have bad records in the enforcement of animal welfare regulations, and a sustained improvement in that performance needs to be demonstrated before we can lower our quarantine defences. Will he quickly implement his new powers to enforce higher welfare standards in quarantine kennels, and close those kennels where the regulations are breached?

Mr. Rooker: My hon. Friend is right. As the House knows, the expert advisory group is comparing five options with the current system. We have asked it to present any option that is as good or better at protecting this country from rabies than the status quo. If it comes up with such an option, we shall fully consult the wider public, including pet owners and non pet owners, and there will be discussions in the House, after which we shall take actions accordingly.

On my hon. Friend's specific question, he is right about welfare in kennels. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on successfully piloting through the Animal Health (Amendment) Act 1998, which allows the Government to make statutory rules for welfare in quarantine. We are having discussions with the kennel owners and the welfare societies about implementing those rules at a very early date.

Farm Incomes

3. Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): If he will make a statement on farm incomes in the year to 1 May 1998. [47158]

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Dr. John Cunningham): Total income from farming is estimated on a calendar year basis. In the last year for which figures are available, 1997, total income from farming fell by 37 per cent. in real terms.

Mr. Bercow: I thank the Minister for his answer, but I hope that he does not underestimate the damage that is being inflicted by current policies. What has he to say to Mr. Godfrey Caldwell, who runs a grass-drying business in my constituency? The strength of the pound has slashed the prices of his products by 40 per cent. over the last year, has cut a quarter of a million pounds from his turnover although the same amount of work has been undertaken, and has caused him to make a loss for the first time in his 42-year career in the industry. Does the Minister understand why Mr. Caldwell considers him to be the worst occupant of his high office in living memory?

Dr. Cunningham: I understand—as, I think, does every hon. Member—that the strength of sterling causes problems to farmers, and, for that matter, to manufacturing industry. I also understand—as the hon. Gentleman was a special adviser to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury in the last Conservative Government, I hope that he recalls this—that two thirds of the increase in the strength of sterling happened under that Administration, and not once was one penny of agrimonetary compensation paid.

Mr. Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby): My right hon. Friend will know that the incomes of many farmers have been suppressed because of the legacy of the BSE crisis. Is he in a position to update us on the cattle traceability scheme, which I think will do much to help farmers in my constituency?

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is certainly true that, in addition to the strength of sterling, lower commodity prices have impacted adversely on farm incomes. It is for that reason, among others, that we announced £85 million of agrimonetary compensation earlier this year, and it is also for that reason that the Government have invested £30 million in the establishment of the cattle traceability scheme, which is located in Workington. I shall visit it tomorrow with the president of the National Farmers Union to get an on-the-spot update on progress, but I can tell the House that we are on course for the scheme to be fully operational in September.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): Following our exchanges at our last agriculture Question Time about the continuing crisis in farm incomes, and the related increase in the number of farmers and their families who are now receiving various social security benefits, does the Minister share my surprise at what was revealed yesterday by the answers to my written questions to the Department of Social Security?

Those answers reveal, that the Department has no reliable data on either the number of farmers involved, or the percentage who are in need of state benefits. They also reveal that the Department's figures do not correlate with the Ministry's census figures in regard to the number of farmers in the country.

Will the Minister undertake an urgent inquiry to try to rectify the position? As he is meeting the president of the National Farmers Union tomorrow on other business, will he take this opportunity to tell us in the House—as a means of approaching the farm incomes crisis—whether he shares the NFU leadership's view that early entry into European monetary union would help to alleviate many of the current difficulties?

Dr. Cunningham: In answer to the hon. Gentleman's last point, let me say that the Government have made their position clear. It is interesting to note that the National Farmers Union shares the Government's view of the importance of this issue to farmers—unlike the Conservative Opposition, whose policy continues to be extremely damaging to Britain in general and to farmers in particular.

As for the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I have not seen the answers that he has received from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, but I give him an undertaking that I will consider them urgently. If there is any need to improve the liaison between my Ministry and the Department for Social Security—I acknowledge that there are always opportunities to improve the way in which we perform—we shall certainly do so.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): Does my right hon. Friend agree with the analogy of bringing a supertanker to a halt, as suggested by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health? The Government took over an industry that was devastated by the BSE crisis, with farm incomes plummeting since March 1996, and it takes time to stop such a precipitious fall. The decline has now halted and we can look forward to recovery and subsequent growth in farm incomes in the final years of this Parliament.

Dr. Cunningham: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Farm incomes were in steep decline at the time of the general election. The previous Administration did nothing about it, and certainly never paid any agrimonetary compensation. I share my hon. Friend's hope that we can turn round the disastrous circumstances affecting farmers, and especially livestock farmers and the beef industry, as a consequence of the Conservative Government's abysmal policy failures.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): Is not it time that Ministers stopped blaming BSE for the crisis in agriculture and recognised that BSE has nothing whatever to do with the collapse in milk, sheep or grain prices? Does he recall the Parliamentary Secretary saying at a previous Agriculture Question Time that 50 per cent. of farmers have borrowings? Why, then, do all the agriculture managers of the major banks say that the figure is between 70 and 90 per cent., and that those borrowings are going up by about 8 per cent. overall and 16 per cent. in Scotland? Is it any wonder that farmers throughout Britain think that the Government do not know and do not care?

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman's synthetic anger is misplaced. If he talks to beef farmers, he will find that they really do think that the ban on their product resulting from the previous Government's failures is one of the biggest problems that they face; they say that repeatedly. The information that we get from the banks is very different from the figures that he has just cited.

Sea Levels (South-east)

4. Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Pursuant to his answer of 4 June 1998, Official Report, column 341, on sea levels in the Thames estuary and River Medway, if he will carry out surveys relating solely to projected sea level rises. [47159]

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): It is not the Ministry's responsibility to undertake such surveys. The Environment Agency is responsible for undertaking surveys and studies as part of its flood defence functions; in doing so, it takes into account Ministry guidance on sea level rise.

Mr. Mackinlay: Like many others, I am concerned that this is a question of falling between stools. The Government need to take the initiative and examine the impact on coastal regions of rising sea levels, because the evidence suggests that there will be significant flood tides on the Thames and Medway over the next quarter of a century, which will necessitate increasing use of the Thames barrier and involve a danger of its being overtopped. The problem should be addressed by the Government on behalf of all hon. Members who represent coastal regions.

Mr. Morley: I can reassure my hon. Friend that the projected rises in sea level are taken into account in Environment Agency surveys and in our flood defence calculations. It is not considered that the flood defences in my hon. Friend's constituency are at risk. I know that there has been some press speculation that he has offended the Prime Minister in some way, but I assure him that there is no danger that his constituency will be obliterated as a result.

Common Agricultural Policy

5. Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): What assessment he has made of the impact of the German Government's proposed reduction of its national contribution to the EU budget upon the common agricultural policy. [47160]

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Dr. John Cunningham): One key reason why the German contribution is so high is the cost of the common agricultural policy. The best way of keeping member states' contributions to affordable levels is to ensure firm control of the Union's spending. That necessitates policy reform. We hope that Germany will join us in pressing for fundamental reform of the CAP, which will bring savings in the longer term.

Mr. Wilkinson: Is it not the case that neither German electioneering nor the right hon. Gentleman's empty rhetoric have done anything to modify the burgeoning growth of the common agricultural policy? How can he countenance £1 billion ecu in subsidy for tobacco growing? How can he approve of £857 million ecu for wine production up to 2003? Is not the CAP a protection racket for booze and fags?

Dr. Cunningham: I share some of the hon. Gentleman's concerns about the cost of the CAP but I do not share his attitude towards persuading our colleagues in Europe to change it. I also share his view about the tobacco regime; Britain is one of the minority of five member states that do not grow tobacco. Ten members do grow tobacco, and that is why there is a tobacco regime. We can change the situation only by sensible and reasonable negotiation, and not by using the kind of language employed by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Once the German elections have passed, are there any plans for serious discussion of what will happen when new member states begin to make demands on the CAP pool?

Dr. Cunningham: My hon. Friend raises the important need to reform CAP as part of the process of enlargement. It is untenable to suppose that the policy as presently constituted and financed could be acceptable when there is a significant increase in the member states of the European Union.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): The Minister must know that he has allowed the presidency of the EU to go by without his placing those important matters on the agenda. Is that why he has not bothered to go to a single agricultural show during the United Kingdom presidency? There are rumours that when he does turn up for one, it will have to be specially policed so that farmers can be kept away from him.

Dr. Cunningham: We can conclude from that question that the hon. Gentleman slept through the UK presidency. In reality, the Agriculture Council unanimously approved conclusions that were adopted at the Cardiff summit. Work on those conclusions will be continued by the Austrian presidency. The hon. Gentleman could not be more wrong.

Genetically Modified Organisms

6. Mr. David Drew (Stroud): If the Government will organise an independent investigation into genetically modified organisms, with particular regard to (a) labelling and (b) segregation. [47161]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): We have no current plans to do as my hon. Friend asks, but the Government will hold public consultation on biotechnology in the near future in order to inform future policy.

Mr. Drew: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Responsibility for GMOs is shared jointly with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. Will the Minister acknowledge the unprecedented level of interest in GMOs, ranging from the Prince of Wales to The Express? Will he reconsider his earlier reply, and consider an investigation into labelling and segregation of GMOs to ensure consumer confidence and choice?

Mr. Rooker: The widespread interest in how our food is produced, marketed and labelled should be welcomed by everyone. We ask, however, that people consider the science. I could nitpick about The Express article on Monday, which contained inaccuracies. From September, compulsory labelling of genetically modified soya and maize will begin. Several other products are already voluntarily labelled to show that they are genetically modified. We cannot force segregation of crops internationally as we would have a problem with the World Trade Organisation, but the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food produced a list of 48 suppliers of non-genetically modified soya and maize a few weeks ago. Others have since been added to the list, which now names 57 suppliers. The more information available, the better for all concerned.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes): Can the Minister explain why acres of genetically modified soya have been planted just 100 yards from the largest organic farm in the west country without any consultation with the organic farmer about the effect on his livelihood? How can 841 acres of genetically modified trials, approved by MAFF, be allowed only 100 yards from an organic farm?

Mr. Rooker: It is not MAFF that approves that. [Interruption.] No, it is not. It is right that more than one Government Department is involved. In terms of crops, the Department of the Environment controls the releases to the environment through its advisory committee. It is important that it is not MAFF, the food-sponsoring Ministry, which plays that role. If I have the location of the farm mentioned by the hon. Gentleman correctly in mind, there are few acres of genetically modified crops within the total of the experimental acres and the genetically modified crops are 2 km away from the organic farm.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that scientists are often regarded as arrogant, distant and uncaring, and that they, too, must win the argument with the consumer?

Mr. Rooker: I endorse what my hon. Friend said. Many scientists wish to be as open as possible. Obviously, sometimes confidentiality and peer group discussions present difficulties. Nevertheless, it is in the interests of science that it is as open as possible and it is in the interests of us all that we keep scientists on tap, not on top.

Agrimonetary Compensation Payments

7. Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): If he will reconsider his decision not to make agrimonetary compensation payments. [47162]

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Dr. John Cunningham): I announced on 3 February our decision to pay £85 million in agrimonetary compensation to the UK beef and sheepmeat sectors. This is the first occasion on which a UK Government have paid such aid.

Mr. Gill: Is not the real reason why the Government refuse to pay the full amount of agrimonetary compensation because they are trying to browbeat individual farmers into abandoning their opposition to the single currency? [Laughter.] I am talking about the views, not of the National Farmers Union which the Minister has already articulated, but of individual farmers. In many respects, the views of the NFU are as different from the views of individual farmers, and as out of touch with them, as the views of the Government are out of sympathy with public opinion.

Dr. Cunningham: Even for the fevered anti-European imagination of the hon. Gentleman that one is a tall story. As I have already told the House, the reality is that this is the first Administration ever to pay agrimonetary compensation to farmers and—

Mr. Gill: A tiny amount.

Dr. Cunningham: We have paid 95 per cent. of the total available to sheep farmers and 75 per cent. of the total available to beef farmers.

Fishing

8. Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): When he next proposes to meet the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations to discuss the regulation of fishing. [47163]

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): Frequent meetings are held with the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations on a wide range of fisheries issues. No firm date has been set for a future meeting, but I last met them on Monday of this week.

Mr. Mitchell: I know that my hon. Friend makes unprecedented efforts to keep in touch with the industry and, in particular, to come to its natural home in Grimsby and consult the industry there. At the same time, he is imposing an unprecedented diet of change and now the possibility of charges on the hard pressed industry. Will he undertake, first, to introduce changes and charges only by consent and after consultation and, secondly, to impose no more restrictions or charges on the British industry than its European competitors face? We need a genuinely level fishing ground where regulations are not imposed and enforced in this country while they are blithely ignored across Europe.

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend knows as well as I do that, when we came to power over a year ago, we inherited a fishing industry in utter shambles. That is why a great many changes in regulations and procedures have been introduced. It is correct to say that, as part of a comprehensive spending review, we have been considering all options, including whether there is a case for charges. That is an academic exercise, and we have made available to the industry the results. I assure my hon. Friend that proposals will not come forward without full and proper consultation with the industry and without taking into account what other European countries are doing in relation to such things as charges.

Mr. John Townend (East Yorkshire): Is the Minister aware of the great disappointment that, under the proposed regulations, Bridlington will not be a designated port? Is he aware that the reasons that he gave me in his letter of 17 June—that there were no auction facilities and no fisheries office—are not acceptable? It is not acceptable that such decisions are made for bureaucratic convenience. My fishermen see this as further evidence that this is a Government of deregulation and I hope that he will reconsider that decision.

Even more worrying to my fishermen is the fear that in future the regulations for designated ports might be extended to those dealing with pelagic varieties, which would severely affect Bridlington. Can the Minister give an assurance that there will be no extension?

Mr. Morley: Designated ports have been introduced to try to improve fisheries enforcement. Whether we like it or not, there is a problem of enforcement and blackfish. This is a national issue for which we are responsible. In addition to the reasons given in the letter to which the hon. Gentleman referred, Bridlington was not included because of the number of over-20 m boats which operate from there. We have received representations from Bridlington and they will be considered as part of the consultation exercise. However, I emphasise that the restriction applies only to over-20 m vessels and it simply requires them to give only four hours notice on their way to port or in port to give us the option of having a seafish inspector on the quayside to ensure that everything is in order.

Mr. Andrew George (St. Ives): What assurance can the Minister give the House that Britain's 6 and 12 mile fishing limits can be protected after the reform of the common fisheries policy in 2002?

Mr. Morley: I can certainly assure the hon. Gentleman that we take the issue seriously. The 6 and 12 mile limits are a derogation from the common fisheries policy and must be renewed by a majority vote in the Council of Ministers. However, the value of the 6 and 12 mile limits has already been emphasised in a letter to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister from the President of the Commission. I am confident that the value of the 6 and 12 mile limits, which other countries also acknowledge, means that they will continue after 2002. That certainly will not be part of the conspiracy theories against Europe that we have heard today in the House.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney): Fishermen in my constituency feel that my hon. Friend has done well since the election in his support for the fishing industry, but they never stop telling me that the fishing regulations are just not enforced as strictly by some European countries as they are by Britain. Does my hon. Friend agree and, if so, what steps is he taking, and what steps can he take, to ensure a level fishing ground—words taken out of my mouth earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)?

Mr. Morley: I can assure my hon. Friend that his fishermen are right to be concerned that measures are not enforced equally and fairly by all member states. It was for that reason that, under our presidency, we introduced a new draft directive which addresses the issues of enforcement and control, common definitions and common standards of enforcement, which all member states at the Council of Ministers agreed was important and should be introduced. I am confident that those issues will be properly addressed.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Has the Minister given consideration to the implications of the EU working time directive, particularly for the catching sector? Given the complexities of the implementation of the directive and how it will affect that vital sector, particularly in my area, is it the Government's recommendation that the catching sector should be excluded?

Mr. Morley: MAFF accepts that the working time directive is not appropriate for the working pattern of share fishermen. We have had representations from fishermen's organisations and they have raised the issue with the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): What confidence can the fishing industry have in the Minister's willingness to stand up in Europe to oppose further regulations such as the working time directive, the extension of logbook regulations and species recording when he is unilaterally planning, without reference to Europe, to introduce designated landing ports? Is it not time that he stopped contributing to the blizzard of overregulation that fishermen must undergo and did something positive, in Europe and in this country, to oppose it?

Mr. Morley: This is about national competence and the Government accepting our responsibility for the problem of over-landings and black fish. We had to introduce regulations such as designated ports because of the utter failure of the previous Administration to tackle the issue.

Food Quality

9. Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): What steps he is taking to ensure that British farmers co-operate with British supermarkets to ensure high–quality food. [47164]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): The quality of British food is second to none. The Government continue to help our farmers and growers to develop their marketing expertise so that they are better able to supply their products with the consistency, and in the volumes, that the supermarkets say they need.

Mr. Sheerman: That answer may seem a little complacent to anyone who has sampled the diversity and richness of other countries' food. Does the Minister agree that we have some of the most efficient and effective but also some of the most powerful supermarkets in the world? The power that they wield against our farming industry is quite intimidating. Will my hon. Friend ensure that our Government play a role in evening the balance to give diversity, choice and a good price to British farmers?

Mr. Rooker: I do not think that the supermarkets are against the British farming industry. That is not my experience from visits around the country or my meetings in London. They have worked incredibly well over the past 12 months, on the farm assurance scheme in particular, so that there is some consistency and so that farmers are not played off one against the other between different supermarkets. MAFF's task force has helped more than 500 food businesses to improve their marketing techniques. Although we make every effort, we cannot, do not seek to, and are not qualified to do the industry's marketing job for it.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): One of the finest products on supermarket shelves is traditional British brandy butter, made to a recipe tried and tested for more than 100 years. Does the Minister agree that a new EU directive that will make it illegal to market this traditional product as brandy butter is unreasonable? Will he do something to help brandy butter producers such as Charles Gordon Associates in my constituency, which tells me that jobs are at risk from the directive? Will he help it to stop the directive preventing it from selling its traditional product in our shops?

Mr. Rooker: For traditional chilled butters with alcoholic content, if there is a minimum of 34 per cent. butterfat content, I presume that there is 66 per cent. rum or brandy. One wonders what else is in there if those quantities are not matched by the manufacturer.

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire): As someone who makes and consumes brandy butter, I am sympathetic, but can the Minister go back to the original question and address the relationship between supermarkets and the farming community? Many farmers are concerned that some supermarket chains choose to import goods that are produced to lower standards than those acceptable to our farming community or aware consumers. Steps should be taken to increase public information about such practices.

Mr. Rooker: I take my hon. Friend's point, but I can only repeat what I said earlier. This week, when I was at the spray and sprayers exhibition in Cambridgeshire—[Laughter.] Well, many thousands of other people were there as well. I see that people find that a laughing matter, but that is a serious and important part of the industry. In discussions with representatives of farmers, supermarkets, the agrochemical industry and women's institutes—the whole food chain—it was clear that people were seeking to work together to ensure good-quality British food. We claim that it is the best, and that people should buy British, not just because it is British but because it is the best. People are working together in a way that they have never done before. We would encourage and embrace that, but people have to be free to import products. It comes down to nothing more or less than consumer choice, but food will not be allowed to go on sale in this country unless it conforms to the food safety legislation.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): Surely the Minister must understand that there is a growing realisation that the powers of the supermarkets, their domination of the food chain and the way in which they dictate terms to farmers and suppliers are a cause for concern. Is it not a grotesque fact that one of the most effective farmers' co-operatives, Milk Marque, is under investigation while the supermarkets are able to exercise considerable dominance without being questioned? Is it not important that farmers be encouraged to combine and co-operate to achieve countervailing power? Do not the Government and the development agencies have a role in facilitating and encouraging that?

Mr. Rooker: Yes, indeed. I agree with the hon. Gentleman. We are encouraging farmers' co-operatives, but food producers, especially supermarkets, are always subject to the Office of Fair Trading restrictions. They are not out there as completely free agents.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): It may be a shade early to talk of Christmas, but my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) mentioned brandy butter. May I draw it to the attention of the Minister that another Christmas favourite, beef on the bone, remains banned? He knows that we have consistently opposed that ban, and in today's Financial Times and Evening Standard there is a ray of hope in the indication that the Prime Minister is calling on the Minister of Agriculture to lift the ban. May I congratulate him on recruiting the Prime Minister to our cause? In the light of that information, may I now ask the Minister when he intends to stop pursuing people in the meat trade—caterers, butchers and others—in terms of prosecution? When will he repent like a sinner who has made a mistake, apologise for imposing this unnecessary ban and get it lifted?

Mr. Rooker: We are not the prosecuting authority, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware. We are not pursuing anyone. The law is the law and it will take its course. I am not prepared to comment on cases that are currently before the courts.

Abattoirs

10. Mr. Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): What assessment he has made of the effect of the publication of hygiene scores for abattoirs. [47165]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): The publication of individual hygiene scores for licensed abattoirs and cutting plants is one of several measures designed to drive up standards in the meat industry. Although measurable improvements have been achieved and they have been substantial, we accept that more remains to be done, and we continue to push the industry to make further improvements and to eliminate bad practices.

Mr. Cranston: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Will he confirm that Britain is the only country in Europe that publishes individual scores? With the aim of propagating that information more widely, will he tell us where the best and worst abattoirs in the country are?

Mr. Rooker: There has been a considerable improvement in the past 12 months. Hygiene scores above the 65 mark in April 1997 were 61 per cent., and in March 1998, were 94 per cent. That must have something to do with the fact that, since January this year, for each abattoir and cutting plant, the scores have been published. The two plants with the lowest hygiene score according to latest figures for June are Heaney meats of Woolwich and Cruisedeal of Manchester—both cutting plants—with a hygiene assessment score of only 50, which is unacceptably low. The two plants with the highest score were Knowles and Son of Bury and Mid Glamorgan Provisions of Bridgend—both stand-alone cutting plants—with a hygiene score of 100.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): What are the Government doing to ensure that imported meats meet the same high hygiene standards as meat in this country has to meet?

Mr. Rooker: I can honestly say to the hon. Lady that we are doing a lot more than her party did when it was in government—[HON. MEMBERS: "Come on.] Oh yes. On Friday, we saw as a matter of public record that, in 1992, the previous Prime Minister instructed a previous Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to go easy on hygiene standards in abattoirs in this country. We are doing far more than that. Meat will not be allowed into this country from abroad to be sold unless it meets the standards demanded of the meat industry by the Labour Government, which are much higher than those demanded by the previous Government.

Drift Nets

11. Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South): What is the UK Government's present policy regarding the use of drift nets. [47167]

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): The Government have promoted an EC agreement on ending the use of high seas drift nets in order to protect dolphins and other non-target species.

Mr. Jones: My hon. Friend will be aware of the problem of drift netting for migrating salmon off the coast of Ireland, which is devastating the salmon population in Welsh rivers. That is affecting tourism in Wales and, in the long term, it will affect the drift netting of salmon off the coast of Ireland. Will he do everything in his power, at the Council of Ministers and elsewhere, to make sure that that practice is limited to a sustainable level?

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend makes a serious point. Atlantic salmon stocks have declined dramatically. Irish salmon netting is beyond our national control, but I can assure my hon. Friend that, in our representations to Ireland, we shall draw attention to our concern about the impact of netting on salmon stocks.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

The Attorney-General was asked—

Crown Prosecution Service

29. Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): When he last had discussions on the Crown Prosecution Service with (a) the Secretary of State for the Home Department and (b) the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. [47146]

The Attorney-General (Mr. John Morris): I frequently discuss matters of mutual interest with ministerial colleagues, including my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. Officials from the Crown Prosecution Service likewise have frequent discussions with representatives of the Association of Chief Police Officers. Those discussions promote co-operation and effective joint working between agencies in the criminal justice system and are a key feature of the Government's commitment to improving the efficiency and effectiveness of the criminal justice system generally.

Sir Sydney Chapman: Now that we have had an opportunity to read the Glidewell report following the statement made in the House by the Attorney-General on 1 June, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that if there is to be an improvement in the efficiency and effectiveness of the Crown Prosecution Service, it is absolutely essential that there should be better co-operation and co-ordination between that service, the police forces and the Court Service? Will he encourage the new Director of Public Prosecutions, as a matter of priority, to hold discussions with the Home Secretary and the Metropolitan Police Commissioner and to ensure that that becomes a reality in London, where, in my opinion, there is a desperate need for less centralisation and less bureaucracy?

The Attorney-General: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. The need for better co-operation goes to the heart of the matter. A great deal has been done in recent years and many of the 75 recommendations that Sir Iain Glidewell made deal precisely with that issue. The issue goes wider than my own Department and wider than the CPS, so the Government as a whole, including my right hon. Friends the Home Secretary and the Lord Chancellor, will be looking at all 75 recommendations as a matter of urgency. The document is now out to consultation and I should be grateful for any observations drawn from the experience of the hon. Gentleman in respect of London. As he knows, there are particular proposals for London.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Arising from the discussions that my right hon. and learned Friend has mentioned, can he confirm that the Crown Prosecution Service has not closed the files on the murder of Stephen Lawrence—the brutal racist killing that took place in April 1993? Will he confirm that, when the inquiry is ended, every effort will continue to be made to ensure that the murderers of Stephen Lawrence—or at least some of the murderers of the 17-year-old—are brought to justice? Is he aware that Stephen's parents will never give up their fight for justice? Those who murdered their son should be put in the dock and, if found guilty, serve a life sentence.

The Attorney-General: I fully understand the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend; that is what the inquiry under a distinguished former judge is all about. Thereafter, of course, it will be a matter for the police, in the first instance, and if there is evidence, a matter for the Crown Prosecution Service. We have to take it in stages.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): When the right hon. and learned Gentleman next meets the Secretary of State for the Home Department to discuss the Crown Prosecution Service, will he discuss the Lord Chancellor's proposals to open up rights of audience for employed solicitors within the CPS to the higher courts? Will he attempt to reconcile the Lord Chancellor's views on that subject with those that he himself expressed at the Bar conference not long ago, when he said that the independent Bar was one of the bastions of a democratic society? Are the views of the Attorney-General and the Lord Chancellor reconcilable on this matter—or on any other matter?

The Attorney-General: The views of my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor on the independence of the Bar are precisely the same as mine. I have spelt them out time after time—but repetition is important, and a good thing. The Lord Chancellor includes in his consultation paper words almost to the same effect, which have exactly the same meaning.

Serious Fraud Trials

30. Mr. Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): What analysis he has made of the use of juries in serious fraud trials. [47147]

The Attorney-General: In February my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary launched a consultation exercise seeking views on whether an alternative method of trial should be available in serious and complex fraud cases, and on the viability of various options for change. The Government have not reached a conclusion on whether the ending of jury trials in serious fraud cases is desirable in principle, or formed an opinion on any particular options for change, and will not do so until the consultation process is complete.

Mr. Cranston: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that reply. Is he aware of the view recently expressed by the head of the Serious Fraud Office that some fraud trials are incapable of being handled by a jury? In considering that view, will he weigh against it the idea that technological developments have made it possible to simplify cases so that they can be more easily expressed to a jury, thereby making it possible to retain the jury in many fraud cases?

The Attorney-General: I fully recognise the technological changes, which are an invaluable tool in some of the more complicated fraud trials. In her article, the director of the Serious Fraud Office made it clear that she was expressing her personal view. As the Home Secretary said in his consultation paper, the Government recognise that there are concerns that the present system for handling some major complex fraud trials is not working satisfactorily, and that there may be a case for considering some change to the system. Obviously, we shall take into account both the director's views and those of all who participate in the consultation exercise.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman also bear in mind, in that context, the fact that, historically, one of the problems with serious fraud trials appears to have been a tendency to overload indictments and not to sever them? If simple matters are explained simply, in a way that will lead to a just verdict, most juries can understand them perfectly well.

The Attorney-General: The hon. Gentleman is right. The responsibility lies in the first instance on the Crown, likewise on the defence, and above all on the trial judge. The Court of Appeal has long spoken against overloaded indictments, but the hon. Gentleman will recall, in a famous case not so long ago, what happened with regard to the second trial.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): Is the Attorney-General aware of the many misgivings at the possible replacement of juries in serious fraud trials? Is he aware of the public outrage in Israel at the recent acquittal, by a judge sitting alone, of numerous politicians charged with serious fraud and corruption?

The Attorney-General: I am not aware of that case. As far back as I can remember, there have been many views, both in favour of and against, the continuation of jury trials—not just in fraud cases but in some others, too. I for one, with a little experience of handling fraud trials, greatly value the role of the jury in deciding issues such as dishonesty. On the other hand, there are also other considerations in a small number of cases, such as the burden imposed on jurors of taking six months or perhaps a year out of their lives. Some might say that that was intolerable.

Director of Public Prosecutions

31. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): What objectives he plans to set for the new Director of Public Prosecutions. [47148]

The Attorney-General: New objectives for the Crown Prosecution Service are being considered, taking into account the findings of Sir Iain Glidewell's review of the Crown Prosecution Service, the cross-cutting comprehensive spending review of the criminal justice system and the Crown Prosecution Service's own comprehensive spending review. The intention is that revised Crown Prosecution Service objectives will contribute to the Government's wider objectives for the criminal justice system as a whole.

Mr. Swayne: How does the right hon. and learned Gentleman propose to ensure a consistent prosecution policy across England and Wales?

The Attorney-General: We hope to continue the work already done by the CPS to ensure national standards and objectives. To be fair to the CPS, great steps have already been taken over many years in that direction. Provided such national standards are adhered to, a great deal of the responsibility for implementing them can be devolved to local police areas.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Does the Attorney-General agree that it is wrong that DTI inspectors should investigate allegations of insider dealing and report to politicians in the DTI who have the final say? Surely it would be better to transfer the responsibility for investigating insider dealing, under the Financial Services Act 1986, to an independent investigative body such as the CPS, with decisions on prosecutions being taken by the Director of Public Prosecutions.

The Attorney-General: These are matters for my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. Proposals on the future policing of the City have already been announced and are in the public domain.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking): Will the Attorney-General ensure that the CPS is made fully aware of the fact that, under the Crime and Disorder Bill, the maximum sentence—in terms of custody to be served—available to a magistrates court will be six weeks? Will he give the CPS revised guidelines to ensure that more cases are tried in the Crown courts, where proper sentences can be imposed? Will he bear in mind the fact that many of us think that six weeks' custody is far too low a maximum for magistrates courts?

The Attorney-General: These matters are primarily for the Home Secretary, but I shall certainly consider the hon. Gentleman's point about the CPS. The latter has to decide on the right venue in which to prosecute each and every case; I believe that it does so to ensure that justice is done.

Mr. David Lock (Wyre Forest): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept my congratulations on the recent appointment of a new chief executive to the CPS? What role does he see for the new chief executive, bearing in mind the new structure proposed for the CPS in the Glidewell report?

The Attorney-General: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's observations. We have already, as he knows, announced to the House the appointment of the chief executive. He is in post, familiarising himself with his brief. When he has done so, he will consider with the DPP and other relevant Departments how far the Glidewell proposals should be accepted. He will oversee the bringing together of the senior management team for the new structure and he will initiate the selection process for the 42 chief Crown prosecutors, whose actual selection will require the involvement of the new DPP.

Crown Prosecution Service

32. Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): If he will make a statement on the reorganisation of the Crown Prosecution Service. [47149]

The Attorney-General: I published the report of the review of the Crown Prosecution Service—the Glidewell review—on 1 June 1998. Its main thrust, which we accept, lies in proposals for reordering CPS priorities to focus more on the core business of prosecuting, greater separation of management from legal work, greater autonomy for the areas and better prospects for staff.

We immediately accepted the recommendation for the appointment of a chief executive, to which I have just referred, and work is already under way within the CPS and other Departments to consider the recommendations. I expect to provide the House with a progress report in the autumn.

Mr. Bruce: The whole House would respect the Attorney-General for the calm and charming way in which he answers questions in the House. However, if one looks back at the answers that he has given on the Crown Prosecution Service and at the criticism coming from both sides of the House, it is clear that that calm and charm masks a great deal of incompetence in his Department and possibly even on his part. Barbara Mills resigned, rightly, because of the way in which the Crown Prosecution Service was functioning. What about people in the Attorney-General's Department—or will we always be reassured that the CPS is working well, when clearly it has never worked well?

The Attorney-General: I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman's latter comments and grateful to him for his earlier words. We inherited a system that was appallingly bad. We published in opposition "The Case for the Prosecution." I immediately set in train the Glidewell review. It examined in detail what was wrong and produced a report within a very short time—one year—which we are about to implement. We are doing so because the palsied hand of the previous Administration did nothing at all.

Business of the House

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): May I wish the right hon. Lady a very happy birthday, and ask if she will give us the business for next week?

Sir Patrick Cormack: I thank the right hon. Lady for giving us the business for the next two weeks. We appreciate that. I thank her particularly for responding to the Leader of the Opposition's offer and providing Friday 10 July for consideration of the Landmines Bill. I reiterate that she will have the Opposition's co-operation on that measure. I thank her also for providing time to debate the Social Security Amendment (Lone Parents) Regulations on Tuesday next and for at last providing the debate that we requested on North Atlantic Treaty Organisation enlargement.

I draw the right hon. Lady's attention to the matter that the Opposition have chosen to debate on Tuesday next week and, in particular, to paragraph 6 of the second special report of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee, which states:

"The Committee considers that it is wrong in principle for the Executive to seek unilaterally to impose prior conditions on the release of information properly sought by a Select Committee in pursuit of the responsibilities given to it by the House. The views of the House are sought at an early date."

Is the right hon. Lady aware that our motion on Tuesday will reflect those words and that the Opposition will allow a free vote, treating this issue—as it should be treated—as a House of Commons matter? Will the right hon. Lady respond in like spirit and ensure that, as the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) has requested publicly, a free vote is held in the House on that matter?

Is the right hon. Lady in a position to tell us when we can expect statements on the strategic defence review, the comprehensive spending review and the integrated transport White Paper? Much concern is being caused in relation to the latter issue, and I would argue, with great respect, that the Deputy Prime Minister's kite flying is no substitute for a statement on integrated transport policy. Is the right hon. Lady aware that rumours are circulating that the Government's proposals for the North sea oil tax regime will be announced by means of a written reply to a written question? Can she assure me that that is not the case and that there will be a statement about that matter on the Floor of the House?

The right hon. Lady has circulated—as she properly should—her proposals for possible reform of the hours of the House, which she will put before the Select Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons. I understand, Madam Speaker, that you have made your views known about the matter. Will the right hon. Lady seek your permission to make those views known to all hon. Members—not just those who serve on the Select Committee—so that there may be full consultation and people may know exactly what you think, as well as what the Leader of the House is proposing?

Is the Leader of the House yet in a position to say—I ask on behalf of the staff of the House who serve us so well and so selflessly—whether we shall sit in August?

Mrs. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman raised a number of issues, with which I shall deal in turn.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Landmines Bill. I am pleased that we have received sufficient co-operation to make progress on that legislation. There have been discussions through the usual channels with all parties in the House and I hope that we shall continue to make progress. We said all along that we were keen to move on that matter as soon as possible. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House suggested various non-sitting days on which we might consider the measure, and I am glad that we have agreed to use Friday 10 July.

I am pleased also that the hon. Gentleman acknowledges that we have been able to meet the requests for debate on the Social Security Amendment (Lone Parents) Regulations. I said some time ago that we were likely to debate NATO enlargement in July.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned some of the words that might appear in the Opposition's motion on Tuesday. I cannot possibly comment on that motion until I have seen it; although I am responsible for many things, I am, fortunately, not responsible for whipping arrangements. No one would discuss whipping arrangements before knowing what any particular motion said, although I might want to amend the Opposition's motion.

The hon. Gentleman asked about dates for various statements that may be made in the near future. I do not normally give dates of statements in advance, but there has been great speculation about certain important statements. I can confirm that some dates are pencilled in provisionally—the strategic defence review for Wednesday 8 July and the comprehensive spending review for the week after—although events sometimes mean that we have to alter the dates that we have in mind. The integrated transport White Paper is expected later this month, and I anticipate a statement being made to the House. I have not considered North sea oil tax revenues, so I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman on that point; at the moment, I do not have provisional plans for a statement on that before me.

I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has drawn attention to the memorandum that has been submitted to the Modernisation Committee. The Committee is in the early stages of drawing up ideas on potential changes to the parliamentary calendar and, as a whole, is anxious that all hon. Members should make their views known. We are taking steps to ensure that people are aware of that opportunity. I should be more than happy to make sure, with Madam Speaker's permission, that her views were available, and that is something that we can pursue.

Everyone is anxious to know when the recess will be, and, had I been able to announce the precise dates today, I should have been pleased. The most that I can say is that it is clear that the House will not rise before the end of July.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): May we have an early debate on how insider dealing investigations are dealt with by the Department of Trade and Industry? May I say that, for a fact, Sir Nicholas Lloyd, has never been interviewed by Department of Trade and Industry inspectors in connection with the 1994 investigation concerning insider dealing in Anglia Television shares? Do we not need an early debate on that matter, because Sir Nicholas Lloyd has been held out publicly as the source of the tip to a certain well-known individual who traded in shares in January 1994 and made £77,000? We need an explanation.

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend has been assiduous in raising issues of that kind at various Question Times. I am afraid that I cannot promise him the debate that he wants in Government time, but perhaps he will be fortunate and obtain an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I hope that, if I add my felicitations on her birthday, the right hon. Lady will be even more co-operative than she has been on private Members' Bills. In the light of what she said last Thursday, is there any way to assist non-controversial private Members' Bill with all-party support not only to complete their passage through this House, but, if they are amended in the House of Lords, to complete their passage in the spillover section when they come back?

Will there be room in the next couple of weeks, or soon thereafter, for a comprehensive debate on arms sales? There is a general view that the Foreign Secretary's views on the Scott report are not fully reflected in the report on strategic export controls published yesterday. It is a timid report, and I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will have an opportunity to examine it.

Before next Thursday's debate on the national health service, will the Leader of the House ensure that there is an opportunity for the Prime Minister to correct the no doubt unfortunate and unintentional, but considerable, mistake that he made in his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) yesterday? The Leader of the House will recall that my hon. Friend asked what the Prime Minister would do about the severe deterioration in the recruitment position of doctors, and the Prime Minister said:

"medical students are exempt from the new provisions on student finance."—[Official Report, 1 July 1998; Vol. 315, c. 355.]

That is simply untrue and I am sure that the Prime Minister will want an early opportunity to put the record straight. Under the new regime, medical, veterinary and dental students will have to pay extensive sums to support their studies in the first three years. An absurd anomaly is that in Scotland they will have to do so for the fourth year as well. Will the Leader of the House give an absolute undertaking that the Prime Minister will correct the record before next Thursday's debate?

Mrs. Taylor: I will check the hon. Gentleman's last point and get in touch with him about it.

On the two substantive points that the hon. Gentleman raised on private Members' Bills, I hope that some of the Bills before the House tomorrow will make progress. Many people think that they are important measures that command widespread support. As I pointed out last week, the House itself decides at the beginning of each Session how much time to give private Members' Bills, but some interesting suggestions have been made about how we could deal with private Members' Bills that need only a vote rather than further debate. The Modernisation Committee will look at that matter in due course. I am open-minded about what we might be able to do and will watch what happens to individual Bills.

I think that the hon. Gentleman was somewhat churlish in saying that no progress had been made on arms sales. The White Paper published yesterday is for consultation, and it takes us further forward. We are willing to listen to further suggestions on how the position might be improved. At the moment, there is clearly no time for a debate on that matter, but views are being sought and will be taken into account.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Has my right hon. Friend noticed the speculation in the press in recent days about the possible collaboration between the Labour Government and the leader of the Liberal Democrats, and the possibility that he will get a job in a future Cabinet? The other daft idea being carted around is that the right hon. Member for Berwick–upon–Tweed (Mr. Beith) will be the next Speaker. May we have an early statement to put an end to all those rumours? While we are at it, will my right hon. Friend tell the others in the Cabinet that they should bury the report from Lord Jenkins about changing to proportional representation and tell him to stick to what he has always done—rushing about trying to find a posh table at a restaurant?

Mrs. Taylor: I am not sure that I can find time next week for the specific debate that my hon. Friend requests, interesting though it might be, especially to those of us who have been in the House for many years.

On my hon. Friend's specific point, I am not aware that there is any credibility in many of the stories that appear in the press. I am sure that you intend to be in your place for some time yet, Madam Speaker, so any speculation on that front is pretty worthless.

On jobs in Cabinet, I promise to bring my hon. Friend's recommendations to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): Given the pressure on legislative time revealed by the Landmines Bill, which I welcome, can the Government ensure that Ministers are available to take their business when it occurs so that we avoid the surrealist farce that we had last night of Labour Back Benchers filibustering on the Finance (No. 2) Bill while the Government allegedly retrieved the next relevant Minister from the highlands?

Mrs. Taylor: I think that the right hon. Gentleman is under some misapprehension. Two days for the Finance Bill was the time that we agreed to give, following discussions through the usual channels. If anyone was absent, it was Opposition Members.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 651?

[That this House believes that the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions should undertake an urgent review of the standard of motorway driving with a particular view to the need for all newly qualified drivers to undertake some form of motorway tuition and that urgent action should be taken to address the problems that exist and to secure a higher standard of proficiency of motorway driving and to help reduce the present motorway accident level.]

I pay tribute to my constituent, Anne Ravenhill, who, for some years, has vigorously campaigned for motorway driving tuition. The early-day motion has 104 signatures. Anyone who drives on motorways will recognise that this issue is of concern. Does my right hon. Friend see any opportunity of discussing these issues at an early date?

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend is an experienced Member of the House, and he knows ways of finding time in debates to raise issues that he wants to pursue. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions is undertaking a comprehensive examination of driver training issues. My hon. Friend has made points about safety on motorways and about measures that need not penalise newly qualified drivers. That is an important issue, but he will understand that I cannot find time for a debate on it. With his ingenuity, I am sure that he can find other ways of raising this matter.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Does the right hon. Lady join me in condemning the arson attacks on Roman Catholic chapels in Northern Ireland last night? Such actions are attacks not just on places of worship, but on communities, and they are to be deployed in any community that stands for civil and religious liberty.

Is the right hon. Lady able to tell us when the Northern Ireland constitution Bill will be introduced? Yesterday, we launched the assembly. It is like starting a marathon race without telling people where they are going.

Mrs. Taylor: I am sure that the whole House wants to be associated with the hon. Gentleman's comments about the arson attacks. Such behaviour unites everyone in the House, and, like him, we want to place our views on record.

Discussions are still taking place on the Northern Ireland constitution Bill, so I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a precise answer. He knows that we take Northern Ireland legislation extremely seriously. We have moved quickly to present such legislation when it has been necessary. Much work is being carried out at present, and discussions will continue through the usual channels. As soon as I can give the House information, I shall do so.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): I welcome what my right hon. Friend said about tomorrow's Bills. Is it not a perversion of democracy that 74 Bills will come before Parliament tomorrow? The day has become known as the slaughter of the innocents, because many would-be King Herods can destroy those Bills by shouting a single word. It is wrong for the will of the House to be ignored. One of those Bills received a majority vote of 411, but it is unlikely to get through the system and become law. Bill No. 13 on the Order Paper seeks to tackle by far the worst case of drug misuse in this country, which is the over-prescription of neuroleptic drugs to the elderly in residential homes. We should have a debate on the system that allows Bills that have majority support not to get through Parliament and to be damaged or destroyed by malign or malicious individual Members.

Mrs. Taylor: We had a short debate on that subject last week. Points made in that debate will help the Modernisation Committee when it turns its mind to this subject.

Mr. Wilkinson: I thank the Leader of the House for letting us know that the statement on the strategic defence review will be made on Wednesday of next week. Does that not highlight the fact that, this year, we have had only one debate on one of the three services, the Royal Air Force? It is remiss of the Government not to have given more time to the armed forces. Will she guarantee that, before we rise for the summer recess—preferably in the next two weeks—we will have a two-day debate on the armed forces? If The Times is to be believed, they are likely to lose £1 billion of their budget, which will affect the career prospects of many service men.

Mrs. Taylor: I have said that it is likely, although not absolutely fixed, that that statement will be made on Wednesday.

On the hon. Gentleman's other point, we have had one defence debate—we discuss subjects for debate through the usual channels. I hope that we shall be able to have significant defence debates later in the Session, but I think that, as in other years, the bulk of that time may have to be in the spillover.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Will the Leader of the House please consider the position of Her Majesty's Government in relation to the disclosure of information to Select Committees? The Opposition's zeal to criticise the Government is a grave matter for those of us who want to promote a bipartisan approach in Select Committee considerations. I urge her to lead discussions with other Government managers, and perhaps the Opposition, to establish whether the current impasse can be overcome.

Members of Select Committees should be able to approach matters without private interests or partial affections, so that they can seek the truth and fulfil their duty to oversee Government Departments. That is extremely important in relation to next Tuesday's debate—we must recognise that, if such an approach is to endure, it must be reflected in the vote on Tuesday evening. The debate needs to be treated as a so-called House of Commons matter, so that individual Members of Parliament can vote on the motion without fear or favour and without fear of intimidation by party Whips.

Mrs. Taylor: I think that my hon. Friend will have heard what I said to the deputy shadow Leader of the House, to which I do not have anything to add.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): May we have an early debate or statement to clarify the relationship between Health Ministers and local health authorities in the decision-making process? I ask that in the light of the astonishing events in Salford and Trafford on Tuesday, when the Secretary of State for Health intervened, using a legal directive procedure—it has been used only once before in the history of the national health service—to require the local health authority to withdraw a properly conducted public consultation exercise merely so that he could avoid adverse publicity when he visited Trafford general hospital on Sunday.

Mrs. Taylor: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health felt that there had been insufficient discussion with the neighbouring authorities before Salford and Trafford health authority issued its consultation document on 1 June. He believed that any proposed changes to children's services should be considered in the context of the establishment of health action zones rather than in isolation. He has a responsibility to take a position on such matters, and I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman should regard that as astonishing. I am also surprised at the implication of what he said—he seemed to imply that he wanted those beds to be lost and that ward to be shut.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): Following on from what the Leader of the House said about next Tuesday's debate, will she find time to have an early debate on parliamentary scrutiny of the Executive? Many unpleasant comments are being made about the Leader of the Opposition, but, as someone who suffered from acute sinusitis as a boy, I wish him well—it is one of the most painful conditions that anyone can have. The lack of an effective Opposition gives rise to a fundamental problem, but is it not related to the fact that no fewer than 19 of the appointments that the right hon. Gentleman has made to the shadow Front-Bench team have lucrative outside interests? The most recent announcement is that the shadow President of the Board of Trade is taking money from Murray Financial, a financial firm dedicated to destroying building societies and mutual assurance companies. Is not the real problem that, until we have an effective Opposition, the Executive will not receive the scrutiny that it needs?

Mrs. Taylor: I said earlier that I was not responsible for whipping; thankfully, I am not responsible for the Opposition either.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Is the Leader of the House aware that another important upcoming anniversary is the 10th anniversary of the Piper Alpha disaster? Some of us have spent the afternoon in the precincts of the House watching a film by one of the survivors, Ed Punchard, which will be broadcast next week.

May I make a request, which I know will be supported by the hon. Members who represent Aberdeen, the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (Dr. Godman) and many others, for a debate on the full ramifications of the disaster, to examine whether we got to the bottom of the causes of the incident and how the Cullen changes have been working over the past 10 years?

In particular, we could discuss how the Government's proposals on corporate criminality are progressing—I believe that there is widespread support for such legislative change. As the Leader of the House will understand, many of us were extremely concerned when, in a civil action earlier this year, responsibility and blame were placed on two dead people who had no chance of representing themselves. The issue of corporate liability has never been fully explored.

Will the Leader of the House take my comments on board? Does she accept that only if we have such a debate will we discharge our responsibility not just to those who died on Piper Alpha, but to the many thousands who still work in the North sea?

Mrs. Taylor: I well understand the hon. Gentleman's concern, which is echoed by my hon. Friends. I did not know about the film that is to be shown next week, but of course I remember the incident, as many others will.

I will take on board the hon. Gentleman's comments. I cannot guarantee him the debate that he wants in the next few weeks, but I assure him that I will draw what he has said to the attention of all Ministers who are concerned with the matter.

Mr. John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington): My right hon. Friend may have read reports over the past two weeks of the near-gridlock of air traffic over Heathrow airport as a result of chronic weaknesses in the air traffic control system. Heathrow is in my constituency, and I am extremely anxious for the safety of my constituents. The Government have acted promptly in launching an investigation. Will my right hon. Friend liaise with her colleagues in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, so that when the report of the investigation is completed, it is brought to the House promptly and an important issue of public safety can be debated?

Mrs. Taylor: I will certainly discuss the matter with my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): The Leader of the House did not announce time for a debate in the next two weeks on the fight against bovine tuberculosis. As she will know, an important report—the Krebbs report—is being considered by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. May I ask her, in all seriousness, to talk to the Minister of State about the possibility of finding time for a debate on the report and on bovine tuberculosis? Many farms in the south-west are disrupted by the disease, and many people in the west midlands and Cheshire are fearful of its spread. It is important that the House should have a chance to debate the implementation of the Krebbs report before the die is finally cast.

Mrs. Taylor: My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is present, and has heard the right hon. Gentleman's comments. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, we are considering how best to implement the recommendations made by Professor Krebbs last December. A good deal of work is going into the issue, and my hon. Friend the Minister of State has received many representations from Members whose constituents are extremely worried about the problem.

We are not in a position to make an announcement yet, but all contributions received during the consultation period have been considered carefully. Announcements will be made, but all the views of hon. Members will be taken into account first.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Does my right hon. Friend recollect that, before we were committed to going into Bosnia, there was a general indication that it would be for a limited time? In answer to the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), my right hon. Friend said that a debate on the strategic defence review would take place later in the Session; presumably, she has November in mind. May we have some reflection on giving an undertaking to the House—I do not ask my right hon. Friend to give it now—that, should there be military commitment in Kosovo or in the Gulf, the House of Commons will be recalled, whatever stage the recess has reached, before any decisions are put into cement?

Mrs. Taylor: I believe that I made the position clear last week, although it may have been two weeks ago. I said that I could not give an absolute undertaking that statements would be made in the House before any decision to deploy troops. However, I also said—and I can confirm—that, operational circumstances permitting, we would seek to keep the House of Commons informed first.

Jackie Ballard (Taunton): The Leader of the House will be aware that the Equal Opportunities Commission presented its annual report to the Secretary of State for Education and Employment on 15 June. One of its key proposals is to replace the Equal Pay (Amendment) Regulations 1983 and the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, which set up the commission, with an all-encompassing sex equality law. The report is called "Making Equality Work—the challenge for government". Will there be time in the coming weeks to debate the report and for the Government to say how they intend to respond to the challenge that it presents?

Mrs. Taylor: Important though that report is, I cannot find time for such a debate in the next few weeks. It is an interesting suggestion, and one which members of the Modernisation Committee might bear in mind as typical of the requests that we get for debates that would be non-partisan and useful to the House. The Committee is considering how we could find more time for such debates.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): I fully support the request made by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond).

The hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) referred to the second special report of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee. My right hon. Friend can see at a glance that there were sharp divisions on it, as there were on the first report. I fully expect the Foreign Secretary to make an early statement following the publication of the Legg report, and I would also demand that he initiate a debate on Legg.

The Foreign Secretary should bear in mind the advice given in the ministerial code. Paragraph 28.j on page 12 states:

"Every effort should be made to avoid leaving significant announcements to the last day before a Recess."

That is what the other outfit used to do. I do not want the Government to follow that Conservative tradition. I fully expect the Foreign Secretary to come before the Foreign Affairs Select Committee, of which I am a member, to answer questions on the Legg findings. It is better for a Select Committee to cross-examine Ministers and officials than for us to attempt to do so in a debate.

Mrs. Taylor: On my hon. Friend's first point, I think that the whole House agrees with the concern that was expressed about Piper Alpha.

My hon. Friend is right to say that the Select Committee was sharply split on both reports. Other such matters may emerge in the debate on Tuesday, although we have not yet seen the motion. My hon. Friend asked for an early statement and a debate on Legg. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary may well want to make a statement once the report is published. The inquiry is independent, and it is within the power of Sir Thomas Legg himself to determine the time scale, but I know that he understands the urgency of the matter, and I hope that we will not have to wait too long.

My hon. Friend will know that the most recent letter from my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary to the Chairman of the Select Committee made an offer to appear before it; he is still awaiting a reply.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): The Leader of the House will be aware of the concerns in the British fishing industry, especially in relation to regulation. Will she find time for a debate in the near future, if not next week, so that hon. Members of all parties can express the fact that the industry is concerned not only by the regulation imposed by Europe, and indeed the disparity of enforcement, but by the fact that Her Majesty's Government are now unilaterally imposing further restrictions? The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food would then have the opportunity, which he probably would not welcome, to explain what he is doing about it.

Mrs. Taylor: I am sure that Ministers would like many debates, but they are as much constrained as anyone else. There simply is not time in the immediate future for all the debates that we would like. I can only advise the hon. Gentleman to apply for an Adjournment debate.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): The highest priority for debate in the House is given to fiscal matters. However, the Government regard sustainable development as a high priority, too, and have set up the Select Committee on Environmental Audit, which published its second report today. May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to just one of the report's many recommendations, which is that there should be a major debate on sustainable development on a Government motion relating to the Committee's annual report? I hope that that recommendation will be taken seriously.

Mrs. Taylor: I will certainly take that recommendation seriously. Clearly it will not be possible to provide time for a debate before the summer recess. I cannot say whether there will be time during the spillover period, but, if there is not, I can bear the subject in mind for debate in future parliamentary years. We attach great importance to that subject and will consider how to take into account the wishes of the Select Committee.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Will the Leader of the House find time for an early debate on the expenditure policies of North Lanarkshire council? That would give the House a chance to consider the specific and worrying case of a lollipop man who was paid at a rate equivalent to £17,500 a year for working 10 hours a week. Given the right hon. Lady's prodigious reading of the daily newspapers, does she recall that that fortunate individual told The Daily Telegraph on 4 June that he could not believe his luck? He was able to do up his flat, take his wife and kids on holiday and buy a new car as a result of the outrageous profligacy of that Labour council. Will the right hon. Lady enable the Secretary of State for Scotland to come to the House in the near future to defend or to condemn that typical record of an old Labour council?

Mrs. Taylor: I am surprised to learn that the main interest of the constituents of Buckingham is the activities of North Lanarkshire council. The hon. Gentleman knows that this Government, unlike the previous one, have acted quickly. We will not tolerate any failure or inefficiency in local government. It is a bit rich for a former adviser to Jonathan Aitken to raise matters of that kind.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove): Will the right hon. Lady take account of serious concern on both sides of the House and among our constituents about the congestion of parliamentary business? Many matters will not be debated and considered, including private Members' business, Law Commission reports and Select Committee reports. There are also many Adjournment debates: I understand that Madam Speaker received requests for more than 50 such debates next Wednesday. Will the right hon. Lady put to the Modernisation Committee the urgent need to find other channels for conducting our business so that the work of the House is not impeded by the time constraints that beset us?

Mrs. Taylor: Demand for debates cannot always be met. That is the case in every parliamentary year. The hon. Gentleman mentions some areas in which there is particular pressure, and he knows that the Modernisation Committee has said that it will consider private Members' Bills in future. He is right to say that more could perhaps be done. We should use our imagination to come up with new ideas on how to resolve some of the problems, although I do not think that we will ever be able to satisfy every hon. Member, given the time available.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I do not wish to prolong our debate, but is there not an old-fashioned code of conduct in the House? Before Members of Parliament attack particular councils, they should at least find out the facts. The intervention of the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) relates not to my constituency, but to those of parliamentary neighbours. It is high time that the House was a bit more restrained in throwing around accusations under privilege against people who cannot defend themselves, when there is another side to the story. Would you care to reflect on the old code of conduct which was accepted as a convention, whereby Members of Parliament were careful before attacking councils and other elected bodies?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman's words are extremely wise. He has used them before, and on numerous occasions I have reminded the House that with our great privileges also come responsibilities. Before we launch into attacks on other people, we must get our facts absolutely right.

ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts and a Measure:

National Lottery Act 1998

Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998

Road Traffic Reduction (National Targets) Act 1998

National Institutions Measure 1998

Human Rights Bill [Lords]

[4TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Considered in Committee [Progress, 24 June].

[MR. MICHAEL LORD in the Chair]

New clause 9

FREEDOM OF THOUGHT, CONSCIENCE AND RELIGION

'.—(1) If a court's determination of any question arising under this Act might affect the exercise by a religious organisation (itself or its members collectively) of the Convention right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion, it must have particular regard to the importance of that right.

(2) In this section, "court" includes a tribunal.'.—[Mr. Straw.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 13

FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

'.—(1) This section applies if a court is considering whether to grant any relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the Convention right to freedom of expression.

(2) If the person against whom the application for relief is made ("the respondent") is neither present nor represented, no such relief is to be granted unless the court is satisfied—

(a) that the applicant has taken all practicable steps to notify the respondent; or

(b) that there are compelling reasons why the respondent should not be notified.

(3) No such relief is to be granted so as to restrain publication before trial unless the court is satisfied that the applicant is likely to establish that publication should not be allowed.

(4) The court must have particular regard to the importance of the Convention right to freedom of expression and, where the proceedings relate to material which the respondent claims, or which appears to the court, to be journalistic, literary or artistic material (or to conduct connected with such material), to—

(a) the extent to which—

(i) the material has, or is about to, become available to the public, or

(ii) it is, or would be, in the public interest for the material to be published;

(b) any relevant privacy code.

(5) In this section—

"court" includes a tribunal, and

"relief" includes any remedy or order (other than in criminal proceedings).'.—[Mr. Straw.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.15 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Lord): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 1—Breach of right to privacy—

'.—When a court finds that Article 8 (right to privacy) of the Convention has been breached and that save for the provisions of the Convention and this Act there is no other protection or remedy available under United Kingdom law for the party complaining of the breach, the Court shall make a report to Parliament setting out the circumstances of the breach and the action which the Court proposes to take and proceedings shall be stayed until Parliament has debated the report.'.

New clause 7—Convention rights under Articles 8 and 10—

'. In any proceedings where a court has to adjudicate between—

(a) a claim that Convention rights under Article 8 (Right to respect for private and family life) have been infringed, and

(b) a claim for protection of Convention rights under Article 10 (Freedom of expression), the court shall normally, and particularly where the right to impart or receive information about matters of public interest is at issue, give precedence to rights arising under Article 10.'.

Mr. Straw: With these new clauses we have an opportunity to debate the potential impact of the Human Rights Bill on the freedom of the press. The issue was debated at some length on different occasions in another place and in this House, particularly on Second Reading on 16 February. Today, I seek to explain to the Committee how Government new clause 13 fulfils the commitment that I gave on that occasion.

As the Committee will know, there was concern in some sections of the press that the Bill might undermine press freedom and result in a privacy law by the back door. That was not the Government's view. On the contrary, we have always believed that the Bill would strengthen rather than weaken the freedom of the press. In practice, the European convention on human rights has been used in Strasbourg to uphold press freedom against efforts by the state to restrict it. By virtue of clause 2 of the Bill, our courts will be required to take the Strasbourg case law into account. Therefore, we are bringing home not just the rights contained in the convention but the associated jurisprudence, including the importance that the European Court in Strasbourg over the years has attached to freedom of expression.

On Second Reading, I gave notice that I would place in the Library and make available to Opposition Members an abstract of various judgments made in the Strasbourg court, which spells out the extent to which that court time and again has come down in favour of press freedom as opposed to privacy and the right to family life. I know that Opposition Members will have read and digested the abstract and that that will elevate the standard of debate this afternoon.

We recognise the concerns expressed in the press. As I have made clear, for example in respect of the Bill's impact on the Churches, we are anxious, so far as is consistent with the framework of the Bill and, above all, with our obligations under the convention, to deal constructively with the concerns expressed about the Bill. In the light of those concerns, we decided to introduce a new clause specifically designed to safeguard press freedom. We thought long and hard about that, and Government new clause 13 is the result. It is an important new clause, and I shall go through its provisions in some detail.

Subsection (1) provides for the new clause to apply in any case where a court is considering granting relief—for example, an injunction restraining a threatened breach of confidence; but it could be any relief apart from that relating to criminal proceedings—which might affect the exercise of the article 10 right to freedom of expression. It applies to the press, broadcasters or anyone whose right to freedom of expression might be affected. It is not limited to cases to which a public authority is a party. We have taken the opportunity to enhance press freedom in a wider way than would arise simply from the incorporation of the convention into our domestic law.

Subsection (2) provides that no relief is to be granted if the person against whom it is sought—the respondent—is not present or represented, unless the applicant has taken all practicable steps to notify the respondent or there are compelling reasons why the respondent should not be notified. The courts are well able to deal with the first limb of that exception relating to whether all practical steps have been taken to notify the respondent, and, in the case of broadcasting authorities and the press, rarely would an applicant not be able to serve notice of the proceedings on the respondent.

The latter circumstance—compelling reasons—might arise in a case raising issues of national security where the mere knowledge that an injunction was being sought might cause the respondent to publish the material immediately. We do not anticipate that that limb would be used often. In the past, such applications have been rare, but there has been at least one recent case involving the Ministry of Defence.

As I made clear on Second Reading, the provision is intended overall to ensure that ex parte injunctions are granted only in exceptional circumstances. Even where both parties are represented, we expect that injunctions will continue to be rare, as they are at present.

Subsection (3) provides that no relief is to be granted to restrain publication pending a full trial of the issues unless the court is satisfied that the applicant is likely to succeed at trial. Among concerns expressed about the Bill's possible impact on freedom of the press, there was concern that interim injunctions—known in the trade as Friday night injunctions, as the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) will confirm; I do not doubt that he has been present in the courts on many Friday nights earning an honest crust—might be granted simply to preserve the status quo, with a view to a full hearing of the application later. However, by that time the story that was to be published might no longer be newsworthy. As I said earlier, time and again the convention jurisprudence reinforces the freedom of the press against, for example, the assertion of rights under article 8. One example of that is part of the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the 1991 "Spycatcher" case. Dealing with the issue of interlocutory relief, the court said:

"news is a perishable commodity and to delay its publication for even a short period may well deprive it of all its value and interest."

Given that, we believe that the courts should consider the merits of an application when it is made and should not grant an interim injunction simply to preserve the status quo ante between the parties.

I hope that this provision will strike a chord with the hon. and learned Member for Harborough, who said:

"Reverting again to my own sphere of practice, the courts frequently have to balance the rights of a plaintiff who has been defamed or is about to be defamed and wants an injunction prior to publication, and the rights of the newspaper or potential defendant who says, 'I shall prove that what I say is true.' In those circumstances, at an interlocutory stage, the judge says to the plaintiff, 'I am sorry, but the right to utter an untruth, if it proves to be so, takes precedence over your right to protect your reputation.' The injunction is not granted and the article is published."—[Official Report, 17 June 1998; Vol. 314, c. 426.]

The hon. and learned Gentleman was making the point that, even now, the courts are very reluctant to grant interlocutory relief preventing publication. I gather that in his experience, many more times than not, the courts will say, "I am sorry, but you will just have to take the alleged untruth on the chin and if you want relief later, you can seek damages."

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I am grateful to the Home Secretary for advertising my practice. I am always grateful for any such small crumbs. I hope that that quotation is an accurate reflection of law and of practical experience. Many potential applications for interlocutory injunctions, whether during the day or late at night, are simply not made because the lawyers advising the plaintiffs anticipate that the defendant newspaper will argue that what is being said is true or partially true or that there is some other substantive defence. They tell their clients not to waste their time going to court because they will lose and have to pay the costs.

Mr. Straw: That is helpful. The hon. and learned Gentleman anticipates me. I was going to say that in drawing attention to his sphere of practice, we might be breaching the Bar Council's code on advertising, but I think that we should allow ourselves an exception in this case. People on either side of a defamation action would be well advised to seek his advice. He makes the important point that it is already difficult to get interlocutory relief. We are in a sense reinforcing that difficulty, for good reasons that I wholly defend, because of the importance of protecting the right to freedom of expression against other rights.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): I support the Home Secretary in what he is saying, but can he confirm that the provision will deal with the Maxwell abuse, where someone who has—or seems to have—a lot of money can intimidate others by the threat of interlocutory applications? Secondly, can he confirm that if there is a way for a potential plaintiff to serve notice on a publisher that what he is about to publish is untrue or in part untrue, it will be taken into account in post-publication action?

Mr. Straw: On the hon. Gentleman's first point about Maxwell intimidation, we believe that the new clause would protect a respondent potential publisher from what amounts to legal or legalised intimidation. We have already discussed the difficulty of getting interlocutory relief. It will be very difficult to get it unless the applicant can satisfy the court that the applicant is likely to establish that publication should not be allowed. That is a much higher test than that there should simply be a prima facie case to get the matter into court.

To paraphrase, the second point of the hon. Member for Worthing, West (Mr. Bottomley) concerned a respondent who succeeded in preventing an injunction at the interlocutory stage and then published but it turned out that there had been some breach of the law. He asked whether that could be weighed in the balance in respect of damages.

Mr. Garnier indicated assent.

Mr. Straw: The answer from someone much more learned than I is that it could be. We discussed exemplary damages in such situations earlier.

Mr. Garnier: And aggravated damages

Mr. Straw: I am grateful for my continuing education on the issue from the hon. and learned Gentleman. We should all be grateful for that advice because, after all, it is entirely free.

Mr. Garnier: Up to a point.

Mr. Straw: Up to a point, the hon. and learned Gentleman says.

I should at this point explain something that will not be known, with a bit of luck, to the hon. and learned Member for Harborough, but may be known to the two Liberal Democrat Members sitting below the Gangway. The existing law in this area in Scotland is different from that in England and Wales. The Scottish courts, in considering whether to grant an interim order restraining publication, will take account of the relative strengths of the case put forward by each party. A Scottish court would be unlikely to grant an interim order unless it was already satisfied that the applicant was likely to establish his case. Therefore, subsection (3) is technically unnecessary in Scotland. It remains true, however, that media activities cross the boundaries of the separate jurisdictions in the United Kingdom, as I rather famously know from my experience at Christmas. For that reason, and because it is right in principle, we believe that the safeguards for freedom of expression contained in the new clause should apply throughout the United Kingdom.

4.30 pm

Subsection (4) requires the court to have particular regard to the importance of the article 10 right to freedom of expression. Where the proceedings concern journalistic, literary or artistic material, the court must also have particular regard to the extent to which the material has, or is about to, become available to the public—in other words, a question of prior publication—and the extent to which publication would be in the public interest. If the court and the parties to the proceedings know that a story will shortly be published anyway, for example, in another country or on the internet, that must affect the decision whether it is appropriate to restrain publication by the print or broadcast media in this country.

Under subsection (4), the court must also have particular regard to any relevant privacy code. Depending on the circumstances, that could be the newspaper industry code of practice operated by the Press Complaints Commission, the Broadcasting Standards Commission code, the Independent Television Commission code, or a broadcaster's internal code such as that operated by the BBC. The fact that a newspaper has complied with the terms of the code operated by the PCC—or conversely, that it has breached the code—is one of the factors that we believe the courts should take into account in considering whether to grant relief.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): I am sorry to take the right hon. Gentleman back slightly, but would he care to amplify on the definition of "the public interest", which is a critical phrase in subsection (4)(a)(ii) of the new clause?

Mr. Straw: I was hoping not to have my brain exercised in such a challenging way. The courts are well versed in making judgments about the balance between a private interest of an applicant before them and the wider public interest. That is inherent in any case in a clash between article 10 and article 8. It is also inherent in the way in which the courts until now have dealt with many issues surrounding proceedings for defamation. The European convention and the European Court of Human Rights have devoted quite a lot of time and effort to developing the concept of the public interest. Without being too tautologous, one of the points of the public interest is, to quote the words of the Strasbourg court in Handyside v. the United Kingdom in 1976, that "freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society, one of the basic conditions for its progress, and for the development of every man"— and these days, I have no doubt, every woman. That is a brief sketch of a subject on which I have every confidence in the courts' ability to make good judgments in particular cases.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am grateful to the Home Secretary for allowing me to intervene a second time. On the subject of privacy codes, one of the interesting questions that need to be put to publishers, proprietors and editors is: what are their own standards that their own staff are supposed to meet? Obviously, there are times when, in the public interest, they have to investigate—to act like a vacuum cleaner and suck up the dirt—in order to discover what is right and justifiable to print. They do not have an easy job, but, instead of relying solely on the Press Complaints Commission code or the similar requirements for broadcasters, will the Home Secretary confirm that all such organisations ought to have their own standards about which their own staff and freelances know; that those standards should be made public; and that if, when challenged, it is shown that they have fallen below their own standards, as well as below the standards of the PCC or the broadcasting authorities, that would class as a "relevant privacy code" under the legislation?

Mr. Straw: First, the hon. Gentleman asserts that all those organisations ought to have their own privacy code. I understand his point, but I do not think that it is up to us to assert that an individual private newspaper ought to have its own privacy code. However, it is very much in newspapers' interests to have such a code, because otherwise they would not get the benefit of the relevant limb, which is subsection (4)(b) of the new clause.

Secondly, I would point out that national newspapers and those belonging to the regional newspaper associations are all members of the Press Complaints Commission; therefore, they have signed up to the PCC code, which, as far as I am aware, is the strongest and certainly the most public press code available. It may well be that other newspapers, both those within and those outside the PCC framework, have their own codes on staff conduct. Plainly, the higher the conduct required, the better for the public and—this is why the provision creates a virtuous circle—the better the defence available under the new clause to a newspaper, should it be subject to an application for relief, for example, under article 8.

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): While my right hon. Friend is still on the subject of subsection (4)(a)(i), I should be grateful if he clarified the exact meaning of the material that is, or is about to become, available to the public; and whether that word "public" would have a geographical limitation. This is a "Spycatcher" clause and the argument used in the "Spycatcher" case was that the material was available to the public in any country other than the United Kingdom. In the only similar case—the one involving my right hon. Friend, to which he referred—the argument used was that the material was available to newspaper readers in Scotland. However, if the term "public" was interpreted in a very narrow way, such arguments might fail.

Mr. Straw: There is no direct qualification to the word "public" in the new clause. Ultimately, it would be a matter for the courts to decide, based on common sense and proportionality. The fact that the information was available across the globe in very narrow circumstances would not be weighed in the balance. The fact that, in the situation in which I was involved at Christmas, the information was fully public in newspapers in Scotland and, by virtue of that fact, available in newspapers on sale at every London railway terminus and airport, made the notion of protection by an injunction issued in courts covering only England and Wales rather risible. The courts would be bound to take such facts into account. As I said earlier, they would also take into account the extent to which the information was available in another country or on the internet, but in each case, the courts would have to apply balance and proportionality.

The reference in the new clause to "conduct connected with such material"

is intended for cases where journalistic inquiries suggest the presence of a story, but no actual material yet exists—perhaps because the story has not yet been written.

Subsection (5) provides that references to a court include references to a tribunal, and that references to relief include references to any remedy or order, other than in criminal proceedings. We drafted the amendment with civil, rather than criminal, proceedings against the media in mind. Without such an exclusion, judges wanting to impose reporting restrictions in a criminal trial would, for example, have to consider any relevant privacy code, although plainly it would not be appropriate in that context.

Nevertheless, as public authorities, the criminal courts will of course, in the same way as other courts, be required not to act in a way that is incompatible with articles 8 and 10 and other convention rights. The special provision that we are making in new clause 13 does not therefore exempt criminal courts from the general obligations imposed by other provisions of the Bill. However, had we included criminal proceedings under new clause 13, we would have made the running of criminal trials very complicated.

[Mr. Straw]

I hope that the Committee found that explanation useful. I shall now make some general points and then deal with the Opposition new clauses. Much of the debate on this issue in recent months has concerned the Press Complaints Commission. Indeed, amendments were tabled that would have exempted it from the public authority provisions of the Bill.

As the Committee will know, we did not consider that the idea of exempting any particular organisation from the provisions of the Bill would have been consistent with the scheme of the Bill. Indeed, it could have been inconsistent with the convention as well. In any event, new clause 13 seems to us a better and more thorough response to the concerns that have been expressed.

As the regulator of the newspaper industry, the PCC has an obvious interest in any amendment to safeguard the freedom of the press. As I explained on Second Reading, Lord Williams of Mostyn and I had been involved in detailed discussions about that with the chairman of the PCC, Lord Wakeham, and we reached an understanding on a framework for amending the Bill.

The new clause was drafted in consultation with Lord Wakeham and representatives of the national and regional press. They have given it a warm welcome, as Lord Wakeham made clear in a statement earlier today. I am grateful to him for having said:

"I warmly welcome it"—

the new clause—

"as I know does the newspaper industry—and am grateful for the skilful way the Government has dealt with the potential problems."

The Government have always made clear our support for effective self-regulation as administered by the Press Complaints Commission under its code of practice. We have also said that we have no plans to introduce legislation creating a general law of privacy. On the question of prior restraint, our intention, as I said in the House on 16 February, is that the thresholds that the new clause sets will mean that interlocutory injunctions should be granted ex parte only in the most exceptional of circumstances.

Similarly, on self-regulation, the new clause provides an important safeguard by emphasising the right to freedom of expression. Our intention is that that should underline the consequent need to preserve self-regulation. That effect is reinforced by highlighting in the amendment the significance of any relevant privacy code, which plainly includes the code operated by the PCC.

I am glad that we have been able to frame an amendment that reflects the Government's stated commitment to the maintenance of a free, responsible press, and the consequent need for self-regulation, while maintaining the protection of the convention that all our citizens should, and do, enjoy.

I have explained the effect that we want to achieve with our new clause. If, for any reason, it does not work as we envisage, and press freedom appears at risk, we shall certainly want to look again at the issue. I shall now deal briefly with the Opposition new clauses.

New clause 1 would provide that if a court finds a breach of article 8—the article concerning the right to respect for private and family life, home and correspondence—for which domestic law apart from the Bill provides no remedy, the court must give Parliament a report setting out the circumstances of the breach and the action that it proposes to take. The court proceedings would be adjourned until Parliament had debated the report.

4.45 pm

I assume that that is intended to discourage the courts from developing a law of privacy on the sole basis of article 8's being given further effect in domestic law. But I must tell the Opposition that there are several difficulties in such an amendment, although of course I understand why it has been put forward as a vehicle for a debate about the connection between the development of the common law and that of the statutory law.

First, such an amendment would not prevent the courts from developing a law of privacy through the existing common law, for example by developing the law on breach of confidence, which has advanced to quite a degree over the past three decades. Secondly, the requirement to adjourn proceedings pending parliamentary consideration of a court report would add to delays in the court system. Thirdly, there is no provision for what is to happen after Parliament has debated the report. In particular, there would be nothing to prevent the court from proceeding to grant a remedy for a breach of article 8.

Fourthly, and above all, I urge the Committee to recognise a profound error in the thinking behind new clause 7, which collides with a fundamental pillar of our constitution—the separation of powers between the judiciary and the legislature. It is one of the bases of the rule of law that the courts should be able to say whatever they want, even if that is inconvenient or unacceptable to Members of Parliament and Ministers. So long, but only so long, as the courts are willing to show that independence, can there be a democracy and the rule of law in this country, or in any other country.

To interweave the legislature and the judiciary would lead judges to think, "My intellect, wisdom and sense of public purpose require me to do one thing, but on the other hand I have Parliament looking over my shoulder suggesting that I do something else." That seems to me unacceptable, so I hope that the Opposition will not press that point too far.

New clause 7 would provide that in a case where a court had to decide between a claim under article 8 and a claim under article 10, it should normally give precedence to the article 10 rights. That would be especially so in connection with the right to impart or receive information about matters of public interest.

The difficulty with that new clause is that it goes further than the terms of the convention and Strasbourg case law. Nothing in the convention suggests that any one right is normally to be given precedence over any other right. The courts will need to balance the competing claims and come to a decision on the facts of each case, taking account of any relevant Strasbourg case law. Although the European Court of Human Rights has stressed the great importance attaching to the right to freedom of expression, it has not gone as far as new clause 7 would go.

I remind the Opposition that the same issue arose on the question of how far we could protect the position of the Church under new clause 9, which the Committee has approved. Then, we said that where an issue of the exercise of religious freedom under the convention came up, the court should have particular regard to the importance of that right. That is exactly what we are saying in subsection (4) of new clause 13; we use the phrase "particular regard".

So far as we are able, in a manner consistent with the convention and its jurisprudence, we are saying to the courts that whenever there is a clash between article 8 rights and article 10 rights, they must pay particular attention to the article 10 rights. I think that that is as far as we could go, and I hope that, on consideration, the Opposition will think so, too. We must strike a balance, and we believe that in new clause 13 we have got the balance right.

I repeat that I am extremely grateful to Lord Wakeham and his colleagues for all the consideration that they have given to helping us to achieve what I believe is a proper balance.

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): As the Home Secretary said, new clause 13 is important; as he also mentioned, we have tabled new clauses of our own on the same subject. I begin by declaring an interest, as I did earlier, as non-executive chairman of Regional Independent Media, which publishes newspapers in both Yorkshire and Lancashire.

The only difference between the Home Secretary and me concerns the relative merits of the Lancashire Evening Post and the Lancashire Evening Telegraph. I shall try to educate the right hon. Gentleman about the former; I know that he is familiar with the latter.

The new clause is not exclusively about newspapers. Just as important, it covers broadcasting and any other areas where the right to freedom of expression may be affected. This is not remotely to do with party politics. I acknowledge that there are differing views in both our parties—I say that to protect myself at the outset from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier).

The Government have repeatedly said—this is my first general point—that they do not intend to introduce a general law of privacy. The Home Secretary has stated that the Government do not accept that there is a case for general legislation on the matter. Others would take a different view; as it happens, mine is the same as the Home Secretary's. There are hon. Members who believe that we need a new law—there have been a range of attempts to introduce one over the past 10 years. We can all agree—whatever our stance on a general law of privacy—that we should not like a new privacy law to come in by accident, by mistake, or by the back door.

It is one thing to set out proposals openly and for debate; it is quite another to slip through regulations without their full consequences being understood.

Clause 1 sets out the European convention rights that are given effect by the legislation—including article 8, which concerns respect for private and family life. That article states that a public authority should not, except in certain exceptional circumstances, interfere with the exercise of a right to that respect: in other words, it is the right of privacy.

Article 10, by contrast, sets out a right to freedom of expression and to publish information. Clearly, a balance must be struck between the two rights. The right to free speech and free reporting is, after all, basic in a democratic society.

When last we debated this issue in Committee, I offered the example of Mrs. Maclean, the wife of the traitor Donald Maclean who disappeared to Russia with Burgess. When she was left behind, the Daily Express watched her and was roundly condemned for that alleged intrusion on her privacy. In the end, however, she did exactly what the newspaper thought she would, and disappeared behind the iron curtain. That is perhaps an extreme example of the possible clash between the privacy of the individual and a newspaper's freedom to report.

That is why new clause 7 tries to inject some certainty, by stating that a court shall,

"where the right to impart or receive information about matters of public interest is at issue, give precedence to rights arising under Article 10."

That is a rather broad-brush approach, and I do not intend to press the new clause—but we wanted to set out our view.

My second general point is that clause 6 makes it unlawful "for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right."

The Home Secretary, not entirely without reason, glossed over this part of the debate. What is and what is not a public authority is crucial, but we have been subjected to a bewildering range of Government advice on that—[Interruption.] I note that the right hon. Gentleman is looking for his folder, so I shall give him time to look up what he needs.

On Second Reading in another place, the Minister, Lord Williams of Mostyn, said that he anticipated that the BBC would be a public authority, that Channel 4 might be one, and that commercial television might not be. Even more dramatically, the Lord Chancellor proceeded on the basis that the Press Complaints Commission was not a public authority and was therefore not covered.

According to The Guardian—the Home Secretary and I are both devoted readers—the Lord Chancellor dismissed with contempt any argument against his stance, in particular the protests of the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport. He did so on the ground that the Secretary of State was only a layman, whereas the Lord Chancellor was an experienced lawyer. As it happened, the layman was right; I can only hope that his victory will serve him well in the forthcoming reshuffle. I doubt whether it will, but he deserves credit for being right on this issue.

Mr. Straw rose—

Sir Norman Fowler: The Home Secretary is coming to the aid of the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Straw: As the Committee will know, even Homer nodded. It shows the Lord Chancellor's generosity of spirit that he came back and said that, on further consideration, his initial view had been incorrect, and there was "a disposition on the part of the Courts to regard the PCC as a 'public authority'."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 November 1997; Vol. 583, c. 784.]

[Mr. Straw]

As to our interpretation of clause 6—the acts of public authorities—I can say without exaggeration that my postbag has been almost full of compliments for the exquisite clarity with which I presented an interpretation of how clause 6 would operate—

Jane Kennedy (Liverpool, Wavertree): Hear, hear.

Mr. Straw: I look forward to more such letters arriving by the hour. I believe that the right hon. Gentleman will ultimately accept that clause 6 is the best and more workable definition of public authorities that we could achieve.

Sir Norman Fowler: "Exquisite clarity" is not exactly the phrase that comes to my mind, but I acknowledge that the Lord Chancellor admitted that he had made a mistake. On 18 November, he said, having previously said precisely the opposite, that it was possible that the Press Complaints Commission would, after all, be held to be a public authority under the Bill when it became law. An opinion given to the PCC by David Pannick QC had persuaded him that it probably would be. That confirms, of course, that the Lord Chancellor made a spectacular legal U-turn.

Now, after several months of rather tortuous progress, we can all agree that the PCC is indeed a public authority and will be covered, joining other organisations such as the BBC.

That brings me to my third general point. The Government had two possible ways of extricating themselves. They could try to define which organisations were covered and which were not. In Committee, the Opposition tabled an amendment to have some light shed on that. Alternatively, the Government could table a new clause that sought to govern the operation of the legislation—which is what the Home Secretary has done today. I welcome that. The new clause tabled by the Home Secretary is important and takes us forward in the debate.

Government new clause 13 emphasises the importance of the convention right to freedom of expression. That was also the purpose of our new clause 7, so we welcome the Government's proposal. It is right that we should preserve the present position and guard the freedom of speech and freedom to report. It should be stressed that the new clause does not apply just to the press. We tend to conduct the debate as if only newspapers were affected, but it applies also to broadcasting organisations—television and radio.

Mr. Garnier: Should we not also bear in mind the fact that the debate also applies to ordinary members of the public, who have the right to express themselves?

5 pm

Sir Norman Fowler: Indeed; the debate goes very wide. It has tended to concentrate exclusively on the press. I am delighted that everyone thinks so highly of newspapers, but it should be recognised that other forms of media also report, expose and reveal. If we had named the Press Complaints Commission as an exempt body, that might have helped the press, but it would have done nothing for television or radio reporting. However, the Government and the PCC, which provided help, have found a useful way through.

The Government's new clause requires courts, when judging what is justifiable or unjustifiable, to take account of any relevant privacy code. I hope that the Home Secretary will confirm my understanding that although broadcasting and the press will be covered, they will not necessarily be covered by exactly the same rules, for the good reason that the privacy code operated by the Press Complaints Commission can be different in some respects from the code operating in broadcasting.

Perhaps that difference is more apparent than real. The PCC states:

"Everyone is entitled to respect for his or her private and family life, home, health and correspondence. A publication will be expected to justify intrusions into any individual's private life without consent."

The public interest is the exception, and includes

"detecting or exposing crime . . . protecting public health and safety."

Many of those conditions are repeated in the Broadcasting Standards Commission's code, which states:

"An infringement of privacy has to be justified by an overriding public interest in disclosure of the information."

It also mentions detecting crime, disreputable behaviour, protecting public health or safety, and so on.

I welcome the Government's proposal to tighten the law on interim injunctions. It cannot be right in principle, as my hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, West (Mr. Bottomley) pointed out, that a system can be used to prevent the truth from being told—I fear that that is sometimes intended—provided that a person is wealthy enough and legally well advised. I shall leave it to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough to elaborate.

Other questions need to be asked. Our new clause 1, which we shall not press, was designed to allow us to examine the possibility that a law of privacy will be developed by the courts in any event. I should prefer any such attempt to be straightforward and open. The Government do not favour a law of privacy. How will they respond if one is developed for them by the courts? It is predicted by none other than the Lord Chancellor that that will happen.

Another question arises from an interview given by the Lord Chancellor to the New Statesman in February. He advocated that the Press Complaints Commission should develop a mechanism for prior restraint—in other words, that the PCC should order a paper not to publish under certain circumstances. It is certainly not a power which the PCC wants; I could put that much more strongly. Will the Home Secretary take the opportunity to say that that is no part of the Government's plans?

Assuming that the Home Secretary can satisfy us on that, I am content with his new clause, which meets the concerns that we have expressed and were eloquently expressed in the other place. I share the right hon. Gentleman's belief in the system of self-regulation—for example, the Press Complaints Commission. We underestimate the effect that such a system, and the prospect of an investigation, has on the working journalist. That was true when I was a working journalist years ago, in the days of the Press Council, and it is true today.

It must always be remembered that the task of a newspaper is to reveal and expose. At the best, it exposes criminals and fraudsters. At the worst, it can reveal issues that seem to have no true public interest. Making a judgment against publication and about what is or is not in the wider public interest is full of peril.

In conclusion, I shall tell a story entirely against myself. In 1966, when I was a journalist, I was writing a series of articles on prisons for The Times. I visited Dartmoor prison, where there was nothing for me to do at lunchtime, so I went out on to the moors and ate my sandwich in one of the fields there. My attention was taken by a man working alone in a field near my parked car. He was a giant of a man. When I returned to the prison, I mentioned my lunchtime companion. There were knowing looks, and finally one of the senior staff said, "For goodness' sake don't report that. That's Frank Mitchell, the mad axeman. He has been in prison half his life, and we think we are getting him to the point when he can be released."

Mitchell had been sentenced to life imprisonment in 1958 for robbery with violence. He was only 29, and he had been under some form of restriction since the age of nine. I had a choice. I could have reported the story, and I guarantee that the rest of Fleet street would have followed it, or I could have taken the advice of the prison staff who knew Mitchell best, and whose view was that it would have done infinite harm to his rehabilitation for that to be reported. I chose not to report that story.

Ten weeks later, in December 1966, Mitchell escaped or, more accurately, was taken by several others. He was never seen again. Three years later, the Kray twins and several others stood accused of his murder. They were found not guilty, but one person was found guilty of helping the escape. The theory was that when the hue and cry got too hot, the man was killed. There is no question but that Frank Mitchell was killed and has never been seen since.

The totally detached journalist would have written the story and not concerned himself with the consequences. As it turned out, that would have been very much in the interests of the unfortunate Mr. Frank Mitchell. My conclusion is that function of the press is to report, to reveal and to expose. We will get into all kinds of difficulties if we interfere with the freedom to report. With that in mind, I welcome the Government's proposal. I shall certainly support the new clause.

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush): I shall be brief. I am very interested in the proposed new clause 13, and I welcome it. The Home Secretary will know that we have worked long and hard to try to balance privacy with freedom of the press, and this is as good a chance of success as we are likely to get.

I welcome the Government's efforts, because we are beginning to piece together several laws that protect both freedom of the press and individuals' rights. The Data Protection Bill—which we shall consider later—protects the public by requiring accuracy in the press. Members of the public will have the right to view the files held on them by the press—which might result in some 650 Members of Parliament queueing outside editors' offices on the day that the legislation comes into force.

I do not share the Home Secretary's confidence that voluntary regulation will work—it has always seemed to me to be a triumph of hope over experience. However, as I should like it to work, I am more than willing to give it a shot. I am anxious about balancing articles 8 and 10 of the European Court and how they will deal with the ordinary cases that appear in the press. The Opposition spokesman, the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), referred to such a case.

We often talk about privacy only in terms of how it relates to the late Princess Diana, a famous film star or a famous politician. The reality is that only a minority of complaints to the Press Complaints Commission deal with privacy. It is also important to appreciate that many of the most serious abuses involve ordinary people, not the rich and the powerful. I am fairly relaxed if a person in a powerful position who is used to dealing with the media gets a rough ride, not because that is necessarily just, but because it is difficult to intervene in such a case.

I shall describe several test cases. The first involves the helicopter winchman who, in January this year, rescued nine people from a sinking freighter off the Shetland Islands. Unfortunately, after he had landed the last sailor, he was swept to his death by a giant wave. That man's son was hounded by the press and surrounded by photographers, and he made a rather desperate plea to be allowed to grieve in peace. That is a classic case for enforcing article 8, which protects family rights, in order to allow the son to grieve properly.

The individual's rights must be balanced against press freedom, but I should have thought that a court would rule in favour of family rights in such a case. I ask the Minister not to reach a conclusion about that case, but to confirm whether I am correct in thinking that people who are the target of that sort of harassment and invasion of privacy would be able to go to a local court and invoke their right indirectly, through the human rights legislation—perhaps it may be necessary to provide legal aid in such cases—to stop that harassment and invasion of privacy during the grieving period prior to a funeral.

That first case is about expense and access to the courts by an individual who is caught up in tragic circumstances. The most typical cases of that type involve people who have been recently bereaved in rather dramatic circumstances and who are not public figures. They are the people about whom I am interested.

I have grouped together several other cases involving people who cannot act for themselves. On 5 May this year, the Daily Mirror published details of expenditure at a prison shop by a well-known notorious criminal, who is currently serving a sentence in Broadmoor secure hospital for a number of murders and is a recluse and a psychotic. The newspaper had obtained those details from another prisoner, which was, in itself, a questionable operation. Although the man did not spend very much money—he purchased bars of chocolate, toothpaste and things of that nature, which amounted to only a few pounds—the story concluded that, because the man was receiving benefit, like all patients in secure hospitals, all other benefits in his savings account should be taken from him and given to his victims.

Leaving aside the argument about whether we should put criminals in a particular category and not give them any benefits, the case involved a prisoner in a secure hospital, who was therefore a patient under the Mental Health Act 1983 and had a right to privacy. Who will intervene on a person's behalf and call into question the balance between articles 8 and 10 in such a case?

5.15 pm

There are equally difficult cases involving children. It is unacceptable that children are frequently caught up in similar situations. On 7 May this year, the Daily Mail named a four-year-old child, whose photograph appeared on the front page of that paper, in the context of a story about the child's grandmother who had had the child's mother sent to prison. From my understanding of the story, the grandmother probably took the right action: the mother was involved in drugs, and so on. However, I question the newspaper's judgment in putting the name and photograph of that child on the front page. As I have said before, the last thing that a small child needs is for a mass circulation tabloid to print his or her name and photograph on its front page announcing that the child's grandmother had sent the mother to prison.

Who will intervene in such cases? The grandmother was clearly not prepared to do so in that case—perhaps she was poorly advised about the role of the media in that situation. Children must receive some protection, and I believe that article 8 will address that problem. That protection must be balanced against press freedom and, as the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield said, it is a delicate balance.

I suspect that the Minister will respond by saying that the solution involves case-made law, and he is probably right. However, the purpose of my intervention is to flag the importance of ensuring access to the law by people who are often on low incomes, who may be inarticulate and who, above all, are not experienced in handling the media and do not know about available remedies. Those people need the protection of article 8, and the courts must look carefully at privacy and the needs of family life when judging such cases.

We should not confuse those cases—as has occurred too often in the past—with the rights of the great, the powerful and the rich to privacy and freedom of the press. We must focus on the everyday cases that appear in so many tabloid newspapers. At present, ordinary people cannot get protection of the type that I hope the proposed new clause will provide. I think that it will meet that need, but any information that the Minister can provide in his winding-up speech will be welcomed by those who might wish to consider this discussion if they find themselves in similar circumstances.

Mr. Garnier: I begin, as I did on another occasion, by declaring my interest as a practitioner at the Bar in this area of law. However, that is perhaps not necessary, given that my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) and the Home Secretary have declared it for me. I fear that my colleagues in chambers will snigger when they read the Hansard—if they get around to it—and see the kind things that the Home Secretary and my right hon. Friend have said about my prowess as a lawyer. However, I shall leave it there and bask in the glory, for what it is worth.

The Home Secretary said at the outset that some people feared that the Bill would undermine press freedom, but he went on to say that proposed new clause 13 would enhance press freedom. He cited the agreement of my noble Friend Lord Wakeham, the chairman of the Press Complaints Commission, as evidence of that. The noble Lord has certainly welcomed the new clause, but whether it necessarily follows that it is a good thing is another matter altogether. I do not have any huge or principled objections to new clause 13. I suggest, rather offensively, that it may do a little good and some harm—although I accept not very much.

My main point is that I am not sure that the new clause is altogether necessary. I shall not encourage anyone to vote against it, if that assists the Home Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield, but I sometimes become wary about undue cross-party cosiness when there are questions that should be tested with rigour. In the debate on the Crime and Disorder Bill, I made that point about anti-social behaviour orders, about which there seemed to be perfectly sensible cross-party agreement. I thought it right to tease out one or two issues then, and I hope that the Committee will forgive me if I have another go on this question.

The hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley), to give him his new title—

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend represented Hammersmith, North when I was first elected.

Mr. Garnier: How times have changed. In those days, of course, many things were different, as the Home Secretary will no doubt remember.

The hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush, in his own way, highlighted the point that the press often forget, find it convenient to forget, or fail to distinguish between two separate concepts: what is the public interest or in the public interest, and what is interesting to the public. From time to time, they defend stories that are of no genuine public interest but which they reckon will sell a lot of newspapers—stories that are interesting to the public. We should be aware of that point, and the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush put his finger on it by drawing certain cases to our attention.

We occasionally consider such cases in our pastoral role as Members of Parliament, when we assist our constituents, but when we come to Westminster and enter the Chamber, we suddenly put on a different overcoat—that of a very important person—and think that the press should pay particular attention to our rights. However, it is more important for Members of Parliament to protect the interests of their constituents—the small people who do not have access to expensive lawyers and who need us to protect their interests against the big battalions. I applaud the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush for making that point.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield and the Home Secretary said that this issue is to do with not only the press in the widest sense—I include within that ambit the electronic media such as television and radio—but the rights of expression of ordinary citizens, to which the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush referred. I hope that we can protect those rights, just as much as I hope that we can construct a suitable balance between the rights of the press, and our rights and the rights of other citizens.

I shall briefly outline what I think is the current state of the law with regard to libel and confidence. They represent the two most easily available courses of action available under the common law which the new clause attempts to bolster. In respect of libel, there are already rules of sufficient quality to protect defendants—potential publishers—because, first, the plaintiff must show that what the defendant intends to publish is, with reasonable certainty, capable of being defined. The plaintiff could not go to a judge and say, "I fear that someone is going to say something nasty about me." He would have to persuade the court that particular defamatory allegations were about to be published, so, much as I would sometimes like it to be the case, there would not be, for example, a blanket injunction saying, "Don't talk about Edward Garnier in tomorrow's paper—that won't do."

Secondly, the plaintiff must show that what the defendant intends to publish is plainly defamatory of him. In that respect, the Home Secretary was kind enough to recount something that I said last week. If the defendant said to the judge, "I will justify it and prove it to be true," or said that he would rely on another substantive defence such as qualified privilege or fair comment, the judge would say, "That does not permit the granting of an interim injunction." It is my understanding that the blanket rule can be overcome only if the judge is persuaded at the interlocutory hearing that those defences—justification, or qualified privilege or fair comment—are bound to fail. Indeed, it is rare for a judge to reach a conclusion of that sort on affidavit. Such matters are normally left to the constitutional tribunal of fact—the trial.

Thirdly, the plaintiff must normally notify a defendant of his application and, if the defendant does not attend the hearing, should tell the court what he genuinely believes the defendant's position to be. I have been at this game for 20 or 25 years and, in my experience, it is unheard of for a person to go to a judge's house to try a Friday night job without expecting him to say, "What will the defendant respond to your application? Will he say that it is true, or that he does not intend to publish what you think that he is going to say?" The plaintiff would be tested, and I am not entirely convinced that new clause 13 does any more than is already provided.

With all the diffidence at my command, I suggest that the new clause adds nothing in practice, except perhaps the imposition of an obligation on the court to express a view about the ultimate merits of an application before trial. Indeed, the Home Secretary was candid enough to make that clear when he went through new clause 13(3), referring to the words:

"No such relief is to be granted so as to restrain publication before trial unless the court is satisfied that the applicant is likely to establish that publication should not be allowed."

He translated that into "likely to succeed at trial". Out of the mouth of the Home Secretary came a requirement on the tribunal to reach at an early stage—when evidence is broadly unformulated and the issues not entirely defined—a pretty firm conclusion about the result of the trial.

In respect of confidentiality, the current rules provide sufficient protection to a defendant because, first, a plaintiff must satisfy the court that what is intended to be published is confidential and, secondly, an injunction would not be granted if the public interest in disclosure was significantly strong or the information was already in the public domain. If the plaintiff discharges the first of those criteria, and the defendant cannot satisfy the court about the second, the injunction serves to protect the confidence until the trial, which can, in appropriate cases, be expedited.

When discussing the granting of an injunction in a confidence case, the former Master of the Rolls, Lord Donaldson of Lymington, deliberately used the pun, "Confidential information is rather like a block of ice: once it is exposed to the full glare of the sun, it melts." We should be careful about exposing potential plaintiffs' rights to the protection accorded to confidential information where such information would lose its value if publication were not restrained. That is the obverse of the Home Secretary's point about newsworthy stories: if such stories are restrained, they can lose their newsworthiness and the value of publishing can be lost over a few hours or a weekend. We have to do a little more than worry about the newsworthiness of newspaper stories and the concerns of editors to beat the competition to a particular exciting story. To come back to the point made by the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush, we are also here to protect the interests of the small man.

My third point on the question of confidentiality is that the new clause involves a full trial of the issues on the application, which in many respects can be practically impossible, and the risk is that the subject matter of the action will be destroyed before trial. It may turn out after a full investigation that the plaintiff was right all along. It will be little comfort to him in six months' time if the full trial agrees that the information was confidential and should not have been disclosed. What use is that to the plaintiff? By virtue of clauses 2 and 6, the court will, in any event, have to have regard to jurisprudence under articles 8 and 10 of the convention in dealing with such applications. Can the Home Secretary persuade me that the new clause does not conflict with article 8 by preventing the courts from protecting article 8 rights before trial? That matter concerns me a little, but I am sure that the Home Secretary can resolve my doubts in his usual way.

Mention was made of the existing law and of articles 8 and 10. I have not yet seen, as I should have, the paper that the Home Secretary has placed in the Library of the House, but if it is based on the learning in a text book written by Toulson and Phipps, I probably know what it says.

Mr. Straw: It is Deposit 6042, which I placed in the Library of the House on Second Reading. I have a copy before me and further copies are available in the Library.

5.30 pm

Mr. Garnier: I am amazed at the Home Secretary's command of command numbers—

Mr. Straw: It is a deposit.

Mr. Garnier: I shall not worry about the Home Secretary's deposits. I simply repeat my confession that I have not read it. However, if it says what I suspect that it says, it contains a lot of wise words.

Although the convention has not yet been domesticated—or, to use the Home Secretary's words, deposited—within British statute law, the courts are increasingly taking into account the jurisprudence of the European Court in so far as it deals with articles 8 and 10. The Home Secretary will know of the case of the Crown

v. Khan and the wise words of the, sadly, late Chief Justice Lord Taylor. He said that from the authorities that he cited,

"it is clear that it is permissible to have regard to the Convention, which is of persuasive assistance, in cases of ambiguity or doubt. In the circumstances of the present case the position is neither ambiguous or doubtful; nor is it incumbent on us to consider whether there was a breach of article 8, and we do not propose to do so."

Thus, the Court of Criminal Appeal took a flexible and sensible approach to the jurisprudence of the European Court, despite the fact that it was not part of English domestic law.

In article 10 cases, the Court of Appeal in the House of Lords has again taken a sensible approach to making use of European Court jurisprudence. In the case of Rantzen v. Mirror Group Newspapers in 1986, Lord Justice Neill noted that the courts had no power to enforce convention rights directly, but might refer to the convention for assistance to resolve an ambiguity in English legislation or when considering the exercise of a discretion. He went on to say:

"Where freedom of expression is at stake, however, recent authorities lent support for the proposition that article 10 has a wider role and can be properly be regarded as an articulation of some of the principles underlying the common law."

As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) would be the first to admit, there is an awful lot of good in the convention, of which we need not be frightened, and I am not. All I am saying is that, by virtue of the sensible way in which our common law has developed with the assistance of the convention, we may not need new clause 13 because it does no more than what we are already doing. If the Home Secretary can persuade me that it is not simply a gesture—I see the Home Secretary shake his head disapprovingly. If he can persuade me that the new clause is not being inserted in the Bill simply to placate my noble Friend Lord Wakeham and the barons, big and small, of the press, I shall be grateful to him.

Mr. Straw: The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), will wind up the debate. The new clause is no sense a gesture. Anyone who reads it can see that it provides important substantive and procedural safeguards for those seeking to rely on article 10 rights.

Mr. Garnier: I am always happy to take the Home Secretary at his word and, during the Bill's proceedings, my happiness to do so has increased. I accept his assurance that the new clause is not simply a gesture, although I am still not entirely sure that it is strictly necessary. I have no quarrel with the message underlying the new clause, even if it is not a gesture. If it is of any comfort to anybody, I shall not invite the Committee to divide on it.

I wish to anticipate some remarks that may be made by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton). He was concerned about the use of the word "public" in subsection (4)(a)(i), which says:

"the extent to which . . . the material has, or is about to, become available to the public".

He may find help from the wise words of the noble and learned Lord Bridge in a case that involves his former employer, the publishers of The Guardian, in the "Spycatcher" case. Those Committee members who took an interest in that aspect of press freedom will remember that the House of Lords upheld the then Attorney-General's application for an injunction to restrain the publication of information that was confidential to the Government. However, Lord Bridge gave a powerful dissenting judgment. He was dealing with information that was made available to the public outside the jurisdiction of the court, and he said:

"I can see nothing whatever, either in law or on the merits, to be said for the maintenance of a total ban on discussion in the press of this country of matters of undoubted public interest and concern which the rest of the world now knows all about and can discuss freely . . . The maintenance of a ban, as more and more copies of the book Spycatcher enter this country and circulate here, will seem more and more ridiculous. If the Government are determined to fight to maintain the ban to the end, they will face inevitable condemnation and humiliation by the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. Long before that they will have been condemned at the bar of public opinion in the free world."

Lord Bridge, although in the minority in the Judicial Committee in the House of Lords, was proved rights because the European Court disapproved of the injunction and awarded The Guardian and its sister newspaper, The Observer, £100,000, and The Sunday Times £100,000. That underlines the humiliation point and goes some way towards answering the concerns of the hon. Member for Battersea about information that is in the public domain but not necessarily confined to the jurisdiction of our courts.

That is quite enough from me. The Home Secretary is getting fidgety and obviously wishes to leave. It was polite of him to remain in the Chamber to listen to my warblings. I hope that the Under-Secretary can allay some of my gentle fears that the new clause is unnecessary, albeit well intended.

Mr. Linton: I rise to support new clause 13 as someone who has never seen what is wrong with a law on privacy. The Home Secretary says that he is not in favour of a general law on privacy—and I accept that—but this proposal is a law about privacy, because it incorporates in our law the words of article 8 of the European convention, which guarantees privacy in people's private and family life and in their correspondence.

The Bill may not be solely about privacy, but it deals with the subject as I imagined a privacy Bill would do. Crucially, it determines where the principle of privacy ends and freedom of the press begins. By saying that the court must "have particular regard" to article 10, the new clause establishes, in the fairest possible way, a balance between article 8 on privacy and article 10 on freedom of the press. New clause 7 would put undue weight on one rather than on the other. Subsection (2)(a) and (b) of new clause 13 solve the problem of Maxwell-type ex parte injunctions, and subsection (4)(a) deals with the "Spycatcher" issue to which the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) referred. Subsection (4) brings the Press Complaints Commission within its ambit.

It has always surprised me that Lord Wakeham has been opposed to this measure. He has argued that self-regulation has been an unsung success story. Self-regulation of the press has been a success in the sense that it has defended the press against regulation for many years, but it has not been a success in protecting the public from the press.

I have never believed overly in self-regulation. Life is a jungle. I can conjure up a picture of the jungle in which it is decided that too many children from the neighbouring villages have been eaten by tigers and in which self-regulation is introduced. The high council of the jungle discusses how the restraint can be exercised. Baloo the bear says to Shere Khan, "Could you kindly eat a quota of babies next week? Do not eat too many. Restrain yourself a little."

The Press Complaints Commission is based on a similar principle, because it comprises the editors of several national newspapers, including the editors of the Daily Mail, until the recent death of Sir David English; The Sunday Times; The Sporting Life; and the Sunday Mail. In the recent past, it has included the editors of the Sunday People and the News of the World. I am not suggesting that any of those individuals are incapable of self-restraint, but the principle involved in self-regulation is strange, because it assumes that newspaper editors are the best people to protect the public against the press.

It also surprised me that Calcutt, at the end of his long inquiry, recommended against a privacy law, although he was in favour of a law against bugging, burgling and telephoto pictures. Eighteen months later, in the light of experience, when he reviewed his own report, he recognised that the Press Complaints Commission was not an effective regulator of the press and he recommended a statutory press complaints tribunal.

It is strange that many years after Calcutt came to that fair conclusion, so many people resisted that recommendation. Only 27 out of 3,023 cases before the PCC in 1996—the last year for which figures are available—were upheld. It cannot be maintained that such regulation is a success. I have been alarmed at the reluctance with which the press, and Lord Wakeham in particular, have conceded inch by inch that press regulation is inadequate. That has became more and more obvious, particularly in relation to events involving the royal family. A few days after the death of the Princess of Wales, Lord Wakeham said:

"Motorbike chases, stalking and hounding are unacceptable", as though he had just been driven to that conclusion. The PCC amended the privacy code to make it clearer that it was over-zealous to hound someone on a motorbike.

5.45 pm

According to opinion polls, almost 90 per cent. of the public favour a privacy law. As The Guardian, my former employer, said, this is a type of privacy Bill: it is not solely about privacy, but while Lord Wakeham, as the watchdog, has been guarding the patio doors, a privacy Bill has slipped through the cat flap. I am very glad that it will be on the statute book.

I do not have an interest as such to declare, but I have an interest in that the hon. and learned Member for Harborough and I have been, respectively, night lawyer and night reporter on The Guardian, and on many occasions we have been at the sharp end of the ethical dilemmas with which the Bill is intended to deal. It is 30 years since I first joined a national newspaper as a reporter. I—and many of my erstwhile colleagues—believe that, in that period, the ethical standards of the press have deteriorated alarmingly. Journalists are often portrayed as having no interest in the ethical standards of the press. It is true that, individually, they have an interest in winkling out the facts, however damaging they may be to the person concerned, but journalists collectively have an important interest in ensuring that their professional standards are maintained and that people's privacy, especially the privacy of ordinary people, is not invaded for purely commercial interests.

Many of my former journalist colleagues will welcome the clarity of the new clause and the fact that it establishes the law of privacy as coequal with the freedom of the press. It is many years since the former Secretary of State for National Heritage said that they were nearly calling time at the last chance saloon. When he said that in 1991, he presumably meant that it was about 10.50 pm. Successive Secretaries of State have put back that deadline time and again, even though the problems of privacy and freedom of the press have deteriorated. By my reckoning, it is now about half-past five in the morning. I am sure that the Bill will be the moment at which we say, "Time gentlemen, please" in the last chance saloon.

Mr. Grieve: I find myself facing this debate with welcome surprise. At the start of the Bill's progress through Parliament, it seemed to me that this would be the great dust up. On Second Reading, there were expressions of great concern about the freedom of the press, the way in which the convention would impinge on it and the dreadful consequences that might flow for the historic liberties of the fourth estate that were thereby threatened. It seemed to exercise the minds of quite a few of my colleagues. In the light of the Government's response, I thought that I would have to comment on the fact that the Government were giving way to pressure from the fourth estate—of a kind other than the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton)—and were tinkering with the European convention on human rights by incorporating it in an undesirable fashion.

I am the first to be delighted that, in new clause 13, the Government have done nothing of the kind. Indeed, it seems that, for some magical reason, that tremendous canard—if I may use the phrase—has finally been dispelled. The convention—with or without new clause 13, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) so perspicaciously identified—was never going to pose that extraordinary danger.

None the less, I welcome new clause 13, if only because it has succeeded in placating those who have made some of the more extreme comments about the way in which the convention will operate. The new clause is also wholly compatible with current practice, as my hon. and learned Friend correctly said. I do not think that it will tinker around with well-established principles—at least, I hope it will not.

The cosiness may be becoming too great, but I believe that, when the convention is incorporated—with the new clause to interpret it—it will provide a motor force for the gradual development of a law on privacy. I greatly welcome that, for precisely the reasons that have been cogently articulated by the hon. Member for Battersea and, in a very interesting speech, by the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley). Privacy rights need to be protected in this country, and we need to be able to strike a balance. That balance must preserve the freedom of the press to expose hypocrisy and criminal activity, but it must ensure that photographs of young children whose mother was sent to prison by the grandmother's denunciation are not put on the front page. Those are precisely the excesses of press activity which a civilised society should abhor.

I have never believed that we need a privacy law, as I have always believed that, once the convention is incorporated, such a law will develop gradually and of its own accord—it will assume a civilised, measured and proper form. If it does not, doubtless Parliament will keep it under review—we may be able to help it on its way as and when necessary. I hope that such legislation will not be necessary, and that incorporation will focus minds on the balance between articles 8 and 10, which need to be reconciled if we are to remain a civilised society that respects the rights of individuals not to have their privacy wantonly trampled on.

I do not intend to take up much of the Committee's time. As I said, I had rather expected that I should have to remind the Government not to tinker around with the convention, but I am delighted that I do not have to. The Home Secretary is to be commended on new clause 13, which is well crafted, well reasoned and seems to meet the objections that were previously being raised. We shall keep the matter under review—it will be a subject of abiding interest to me and, I dare say, to a number of hon. Members on both sides of the Committee. As time goes by, we shall have to see whether it is achieving the desirable aim that I believe it can achieve.

Mr. Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): I want to make a few remarks about the way in which the new clause reconciles the rights to freedom of speech and to the protection of private and family life. Both rights are important. Freedom of speech, in a way, encapsulates our vision of democracy; it is essential to our democratic procedures. If we do not have freedom of speech, we cannot operate our democratic mechanisms. The protection of private life involves a range of concerns—our rights, for example, to individual autonomy, to reputation, to the protection of private information and to an individual name. Those are important rights, but, like all rights, they have to be qualified both when considered alone and, in some cases—as we are considering today—when they conflict.

New clause 13 represents a sensible way in which those different rights may be reconciled. It suggests that they can be balanced in a number of ways—various criteria are identified. That is especially helpful. English courts develop the law pragmatically and incrementally, but it is sometimes useful that they should have some guidance. New clause 13 provides guidance on reconciling those rights.

Our courts can gain some insight into how rights may be balanced by considering the experience of other countries. Even in the United States, the right to freedom of speech is qualified, although, under the first amendment, a much more absolutist view is taken of the right. Some Supreme Court judges, such as Justice Black, have indeed taken an much more absolutist view of freedom of speech than is taken by the European Court of Human Rights, but they, too, have recognised that, in some cases, the right has to be qualified.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has placed a brief summary of the European case law in the Library. The point that I think he was making with the case extracts is that, in most cases, the European Court of Human Rights has given primacy to the right to free speech. The extracts suggest, on the whole, that the article 10 right will trump other rights. We know that from the case law that has arisen from this country. The Sunday Times thalidomide case some 25 ago years showed that the contempt proceedings against the newspaper could not be upheld under article 10. In the "Spycatcher" case, which has been mentioned, the court made the important point that dangers were inherent in the prior restraint of freedom of speech. More recently, in the Goodwin case, the court made an important point about the protection of journalistic sources.

Mr. Garnier: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman, but he will not want the Committee to conclude from his remarks that articles 8 and 10 do not allow for prior restraint. Paragraph 2 of article 10 and paragraph 2 of article 8 show that there are exceptions. Indeed, one of the problems of the convention is that it is as much a list of exceptions as it is of rights. I trust that the hon. Gentleman will not move from this point without addressing his mind to the exceptions—including the allowances to prior restraint—that are contained in the articles.

Mr. Cranston: The hon. and learned Gentleman is absolutely right—the rights are qualified. Indeed, as I said at the outset, rights are always qualified. We are considering how the new clause can deal with a conflict between two rights. I shall come back to some of his remarks, as I do not agree that the new clause achieves nothing.

We tend to ignore the jurisprudence of the German courts, but they have, for many years, balanced the right to free speech with the right to privacy.

My friend and former colleague Professor Markesinis has published some lengthy discussions of the German case law. He points out that the German courts have developed sophisticated methods of balancing the two rights. For example, they distinguish between speech that informs, and speech that is mere gossip. My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) alluded to that distinction when he castigated some of his former colleagues.

6 pm

The German courts also distinguish between speech motivated by greed, and speech that is in the public interest. I see that the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) has returned to the Chamber. I am not sure that the story he told does him any discredit; I think that all professionals should act with some concept of the public interest in mind, and I consider that the right hon. Gentleman acted in the right way all those years ago. We must balance those rights, and new clause 13 sets out a number of criteria.

I accept what the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) said about ex parte and interim relief. I am not sure that new clause 13 adds a great deal to the existing law in that respect, but I think that it is valuable in that it refers to the public interest and to privacy codes. It is possible that the courts would have developed a deferential attitude to the privacy codes that exist. In judicial review, for example, the Datafin case showed that our courts will defer to self-regulatory codes. In that instance, the takeover code was involved. The court said that the City operated the takeover code in a reasonably satisfactory way, that the panel was closer to the market than the court was and that it should, therefore, defer to its operation. In time, our courts may develop a case law that respects the decisions of self-regulatory bodies such as the Press Complaints Commission, but I am not certain that we can say at this point that they will automatically adopt such an approach.

It is also helpful that new clause 13 invokes the concept of the public interest. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) asked what the term actually meant, and he was right to do so, because it is a difficult concept—the concept of the unruly horse to which Lord Diplock referred all those years ago. Again, German case law is useful. In one of his papers, Professor Markesinis sets out a range of considerations taken into account by the German courts—in particular, the German constitutional court—in the definition of the public interest.

The German courts have considered, for instance, the motives of the publisher, whether the speaker will benefit financially, the extent to which the information has been disseminated, the breadth of the restriction that the plaintiff wishes to impose on the defendant's speech rights and the methods used. My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea referred to the legality of such methods as telephoto lenses.

Although I consider new clause 13 valuable in that respect, I must add that we are only at the beginning of our journey. Over the years, in a range of decisions, the courts will have to reconcile those two rights. Nevertheless, the new clause constitutes a valuable contribution to the start of the journey.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Mike O'Brien): We have had a good debate, in which all hon. Members have welcomed new clause 13.

The new clause seeks to do what—as I think is generally recognised—could have been a difficult, even precarious job: the job of ensuring that the balance between articles 8 and 10 is right. I am pleased that Lord Wakeham, on behalf of the Press Complaints Commission, said today:

"The amendment being discussed in the Committee of the House today safeguards the freedom of the press and self-regulation. I warmly welcome it—as I know does the newspaper industry—and am grateful for the skilful way the Government has dealt with the potential problems."

I am also delighted by the welcome given to the new clause by the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), in a very good speech. I particularly enjoyed his account of his failure to write a story which he thought that he should not write, for good reasons, finding later that there might be good reasons for him to have done so. That is a lesson for all journalists who must make such judgments.

The right hon. Gentleman asked a number of questions. He pointed out that the press and broadcasting agencies are all involved in the way in which the convention will operate, and that, in the operation of the new clause, separate codes may be taken into consideration. I confirm that separate codes will operate. As the right hon. Gentleman suggested, there are minor—even marginal—differences between them. I suspect that those differences will not make much odds in terms of court judgments, but the right hon. Gentleman was right to point them out.

The right hon. Gentleman welcomed the tightening of the law on interim judgments, which we consider an important safeguard for the press. He asked whether the Press Complaints Commission should develop prior restraint powers. That is not part of our plans, which I hope reassures him. He said that the task of newspapers was to reveal and to expose. We agree that it is a basic safeguard of an active and vital democracy to reveal and expose when at least some public interest is involved. I am sure that that is the right hon. Gentleman's view.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley) and the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) rightly said that we should consider not so much whether the rich, famous and powerful would benefit from the new clause, but whether there would be some protection for the ordinary individual who might feel that his private life was being infringed. I think that all hon. Members want to get the balance right between the freedom of the press—the importance of which was mentioned by the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield—and the rights of the "small man", as he was described by the hon. and learned Member for Harborough. We must get the balance right between articles 8 and 10. The courts will no doubt weigh the vulnerability of ordinary citizens and of the rich and famous in the appropriate way. Article 8 is available to everyone, including the small man.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush asked about various cases. He asked whether the helicopter winchman would be able to claim under the convention and, if so, in which court. The venue depends on the nature of the case and of the claim, so I cannot give him guidance on that, but there would be various ways of proceeding.

Mr. Soley: This is a key question of access to the law. Given that the man was grieving at the time and trying to prevent the intrusion that was taking place, it seems to me that there should be an ability to go to the local court—perhaps the magistrates court—to seek protection. If the human rights convention is now part of our domestic law, is an appeal available on that basis?

Mr. O'Brien: When there is a case that can be brought before a court, the convention can be brought in. Which court that will be will depend on the nature of the case. I cannot give an absolute assurance that the man to whom my hon. Friend referred will be able to pursue the matter in a county court. It would be wrong to give individual advice from the Dispatch Box, and the man will have to rely on his own lawyer. When they become a matter of dispute and concern, issues relating to the convention can be raised in ordinary cases. People have access to rights that previously had to be enforced in Strasbourg. I hope that my remarks have afforded at least some reassurance.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush also asked about a child. There are various options: the child could be made a ward of court, a guardian ad litem could bring a case, or the official solicitor could look after the child's interests. In some cases, the courts decide that the invasion of privacy outweighs the right to freedom of expression. The new clause does not prevent that.

[Mr. O'Brien]

An important point that has, to some extent, been overlooked is that newspapers will not be public authorities and could not be proceeded against directly under the Bill, but an article 8 point could be raised in proceedings for harassment or a libel action, for example.

Concerning the example of the expenditure at the tuck shop of an inmate of a special hospital, there are arguments either way about whether publication should be considered to be in the public interest, and the courts would have to decide the case on its merits. The new clause simply requires them to have regard to whether publication would be in the public interest.

The hon. and learned Member for Harborough made the important point that, when Front Benchers agree, it is the responsibility of Back Benchers to put the testing arguments to the Government. He asked us to remember the distinction between the public interest and what is interesting to the public. I hope that, to some extent, we have caught that important distinction in subsection (4)(a)(ii) of the new clause.

The hon. and learned Gentleman asked whether the new clause went further than the current law. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was able to reassure him to some extent. We are seeking to put in place some new safeguards to provide help and clarity in the law. When we introduce something as important as the convention, it is important to ensure that the courts understand how we intend it to be interpreted. The provisions in subsections (4) and, especially, (2) offer safeguards. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that those safeguards are acknowledged to some extent in the practice of the courts, but now they will be acknowledged in statute, and the added clarity in the law will give them substance.

The hon. and learned Gentleman asked whether the tribunal—by which, I presume, he means the divisional court judge or whoever is considering the application—would have to reach a conclusion at an early stage about whether the case was likely to succeed. That would be the case, but only to the extent that the judge would be considering issuing an injunction. If he decided, for whatever reason, that an injunction was inappropriate, he would not have to consider the substance of the case and its chances of success at that stage.

Mr. Garnier: I am not entirely sure that the Minister addressed my point. If the judge—it is a Queen's Bench judge in chambers, as often as not, rather than a divisional court—is not minded to grant an injunction on the application of a plaintiff who is seeking to protect confidential information, that more or less becomes the main question, because once the information is in the public domain, there is nothing to be done other than the award of damages—and we are talking about non-pecuniary loss, not about anything of great financial value.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): The damage is done and the cat is out of the bag.

Mr. Garnier: Indeed, or as I said in Lord Donaldson's language, the ice, once in the full glare of the sun, has melted.

We need to think more carefully about requiring a judge considering an application for an injunction to reach a judgment on the merits of a trial that could have long-term implications, when we all know that a trial involves the consideration of far more detailed evidence than is available to a judge at that stage.

Mr. O'Brien: That is right, but judges have to make such decisions, and will have to bear in mind the consequences and consider whether it is right to grant the injunction. They may decide that it is not, but feel subsequently that damages are a better way in which to deal with the case. The judge must consider all the circumstances and find the right balance between articles 8 and 10, taking into account the factors that we have suggested in the new clause and considering the hon. and learned Gentleman's valid point that information that has a value because of its confidentiality cannot regain that value once the confidentiality is lost. The judge will have to bear in mind both that point and the consequences that it might have for what the hon. and learned Member for Harborough called the small man. Those are issues for the judges to wrestle with. I am not sure that we can go much further than providing the judges with the clarity and guidance that we are giving. There will perhaps be more clarity and guidance for the judges when the convention is in place.

The hon. and learned Gentleman said that subsection (3) made no difference. We suggest, however, that the law on granting injunctions is flexible in privacy cases, and we are tightening it to ensure that the applicant will in all cases need to establish a stronger case.

My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) made several points about defects in self-regulation. The Government have no plans to end self-regulation. My hon. Friend rightly drew attention to the Calcutt report and the comments of the former Member of Parliament for Putney, David Mellor, who warned the press that time was running out at the last chance saloon. In many ways, Mr. Mellor's comment had an effect, and the Press Complaints Commission is trying robustly to ensure freedom of the press while trying to ensure that privacy is respected. The Bill helps the PCC to balance article 10 and article 8. Our new clause will add to press safeguards, giving the PCC better guidance on how to achieve that balance.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) raised several important points. Unfortunately, his most important point came during his intervention on the Home Secretary about the public interest. My hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston) also raised that point in his helpful speech. I am perhaps tempting further interventions by going into the issue of what the public interest is, but the basic question is whether the public should have particular information. For example, information might have an effect on proper political discourse, or a matter of public policy. It might also affect individual behaviour. For example, information about BSE might have affected decisions on whether to eat beef. Those are areas in which there is a proper public interest in the press revealing information. The judge would have to ask the same question put by the hon. and learned Member for Harborough: is a matter only of interest to the public, or is it a matter of public interest? There should be some good reason why the public should know.

It is arguable whether there should be a good reason for the public not to know something. That takes us into realms of philosophy and jurisprudence, and I do not want to go too far into them. However, judges will debate that matter among themselves as they reach their decisions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, North said that we were at the beginning of a journey. We have tried to safeguard the interests of the individual and the interests of press freedom and strong democracy. Much work and thought has gone into that, and I thank the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield and others who have praised my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and Lord Williams of Mostyn for their hard work on getting the Bill right. We worked closely with the PCC, which has been enormously helpful. Getting the Bill right was important to our democracy, and I am delighted that our debates have indicated that we have done so.

New clause 10

GUARANTEE OF NON-DISCRIMINATION

'—(1) If a court's determination of any question arising under this Act concerns an issue of discrimination, it must have particular regard to the guarantee in Article 14 of the Convention that the rights and freedoms set forth in the Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground.

(2) In this section, "court" includes a tribunal.'—[Mr. Maclennan.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The Bill does not seek to introduce new human rights into our domestic law. It seeks merely to bring home the rights guaranteed by the European convention. New clause 10 is closely modelled on new clause 13, and on the earlier new clause tabled by the Government at the behest of the Churches, which were concerned about possible interpretations of convention rights. It is intended to help to guide our courts in their interpretation of article 14. It may be asked whether that is necessary, given considerable jurisprudence over the years on article 14, but it has not been conclusively determined whether that article should be interpreted as setting out rights that are exhaustively covered by the phrase "such as", or whether that phrase is merely a preliminary—I submit that that was what was intended—to an illustration of the rights protected by the convention.

The point is limited in some respects. By passing my new clause, the Committee would not widen the ambit of protection to categories of people who are not specifically mentioned in article 14 of the convention for such matters as, for example, employment, which is not covered. Article 14 is, in a sense, a parasitic prohibition against discrimination, in that it derives from other protected fundamental rights and freedoms. A number of people are concerned that it would be possible to interpret the article restrictively and to treat categories of persons as exhaustive.

That would be undesirable, and it would be out of line with much jurisprudence. It would also be out of line with how courts in Ireland have interpreted comparable provisions in the Irish constitution, in which grounds of discrimination are enumerated. It would be out of line with the Canadian charter of rights and freedoms. In the Egan case in 1992, Canada's superior courts decided that such rights should be interpreted as not exclusively determined by lists of rights.

The areas of potential discrimination about which some anxiety might exist include disability, age and sexual orientation. As to the policy of the Government and western European countries generally, it is entirely clear that members of the European Union at least are determined that we should take action to combat discrimination based on disability, age and sexual orientation. It is so set out in article 6A of the Amsterdam treaty, to which this Government are party. I hope that my proposal is entirely in line with the Government's thinking about how best to approach the implementation of that treaty obligation. The new clause seems a straightforward way to put beyond doubt the convention's intention to ensure that the protections of our citizens—their fundamental rights and freedoms—are not limited by reference to some status other than those mentioned in article 14.

6.30 pm

The matter has come before the European Court of Human Rights, but not conclusively. For example, the Dudgeon case dealt with sexual orientation and the law in Northern Ireland. The matter was resolved by reference not to the status of the individual, but to the article 8 rights on respect for private and family life. Perhaps the matter has been taken rather further in the Sutherland case more recently, in which it could be argued that the court leant more clearly towards regarding homosexuality as another status protected against discrimination.

The new clause is entirely in line with the policy of our Government and our international treaty obligations. Its purpose is to spell out the matter beyond doubt.

Mr. Clappison: I listened carefully to the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) putting forward his arguments for the new clause. I pay tribute to him for his characteristic care and courtesy in advancing his arguments.

I am somewhat enlightened now about the new clause, but, when I first considered it, it sprang to mind that it expressed a perfectly worthy sentiment, which might have unintended consequences in practice. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman, as I am sure many others, if not all hon. Members, would do, that individuals have access to rights free from discrimination. I know that the right hon. Gentleman did not serve on the Committee on the Crime and Disorder Bill, where we moved similar amendments to protect individuals from discrimination under some of its new provisions. I am sure that the Under-Secretary will remember that. I cannot remember whether he responded at the time, but there was common ground in the Committee on that issue, and the Government were keen to reassure us.

I have some doubts about how the new clause would work in practice. I suspect that the right hon. Gentleman is trying to deal with the problem of interpretation. When I read article 14 in conjunction with the right

hon. Gentleman's arguments, I thought that the wording of the article was clear and did not need further elaboration. It is clearly set out that

"the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination".

The right hon. Gentleman gave examples of people who might be discriminated against and, clearly, he has gone into far more detailed legal research than I have had the opportunity to do. The wording of the article at face value and first glance suggests that it is not intended to be an exhaustive list. The characteristics that might give rise to discrimination, such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, and national or social origin, are set out in the article as examples of the sort of characteristics that should not be discriminated against or lead to a loss of enjoyment of rights under the convention. If I may have my penn'orth on the interpretation of the article, I would think that disability, age and sexual orientation should not give rise to discrimination, but sit alongside the other matters spelt out in the article. They fall broadly into the same category and certainly should not give rise to somebody losing any enjoyment of their rights.

I am not sure whether that agreement with the right hon. Gentleman leads me to accept the need for the new clause to be incorporated in the Bill. He described the right in article 14 as a parasitic right. I was not going to describe the new clause in that way, but it is his description. He is correct that the right set out in article 14 is different in its nature from many of the other rights contained in the convention that are free-standing rights—the rights to freedom of expression, freedom of religion, to a fair trial and to family life. They are all rights in themselves. Article 14 deals with the access to those rights across the board, but is not a free-standing right in itself.

Mr. Maclennan indicated assent.

Mr. Clappison: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for nodding.

The right hon. Gentleman's argument continued that new clause 10 was similar in nature to new clause 13, which we have just debated, and new clause 9, which we debated on an earlier occasion, which invite the courts to pay particular regard to the right to freedom of religion, thought and conscience in the case of new clause 9 and the right to freedom of expression in the case of new clause 13.

I would submit that there is a difference because new clause 10 does not relate to a free-standing right. For that reason, the two new clauses are perfectly workable and should not give rise to problems for the courts. However, I wonder whether this new clause might give rise to problems for the courts, because it is not a free-standing right, but a right of enjoyment that applies across the board.

As I have already said, the words of article 14 are clear enough in themselves. I wonder how a court would try to apply new clause 10. Indeed, I wonder about the type of case that might arise in practice. So, although I am perfectly happy with the sentiments behind the new clause, I should be happier if the right hon. Gentleman could give us more practical examples of how it might operate in practice.

I am concerned that new clause 10 would make it difficult for the courts to give effect to the convention. As I have said, the courts are already enjoined to give people access without discrimination to the rights under article 14, but how would the new clause work in practice and how would the courts approach it if, in the enjoyment of any right, the issue of discrimination arose? Would not the matter be weighted in favour of the applicant and would it not be difficult for the courts to give effect to such a measure?

The right hon. Gentleman has clearly done some research into the cases. He described the Dudgeon case from Northern Ireland, which he said was resolved by reference to rights rather than the status of the individual. It is always slightly dangerous to venture an opinion on a case without knowing all the facts, but, on the right hon. Gentleman's brief description of it, I was rather inclined to agree with the judgment of the court. The court got it right by resolving that by reference to rights rather than the status of the individual. I suspect that new clause 10 may not be needed and that it might have some unintended consequences. Moreover, it would be difficult for the courts to give effect to it in practice.

The Minister appears eager to respond, and I am interested in hearing what he has to say. Earlier, my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) wisely advised us against tinkering with the Bill. New clause 10 may, although with the best of intentions, be a piece of such tinkering, which we might come to regret. I would not go as far as the Minister did in replying to the previous debate, when he described this as a splendid piece of legislation without any blot or blemish and a tribute to the draftsmanship of the Lord Chancellor—the Lord Chancellor is certainly proud of the Bill as a piece of work—but if we were to accept the new clause, we would be at risk of tinkering. I look forward to hearing the Minister's response because I suspect that he will tell us that, although worthy, the new clause is not needed.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) is right, but the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) has raised a series of important points, and I hope that I shall be able to deal with some of them.

New clause 10 requires a court or tribunal, when determining any question arising under the Human Rights Act that concerns an issue of discrimination, to have particular regard to article 14—that the rights and freedoms set forth in the convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground.

I am ready to join the right hon. Gentleman in emphasising the importance of article 14 and the position that it occupies in the convention, and to express the Government's hope and confidence that it will be given full weight in our courts in the same way as the other articles in the convention. I acknowledge, too, that the words "on any ground" are important. Article 14 contains a list of grounds on which discrimination in securing other convention rights is prohibited, but it is important not to overlook the crucial words "or other status" which appear at the end. The list is not an exhaustive one, and should not be treated as such.

I share the concerns of the hon. Member for Hertsmere that we may be at risk of tinkering with the Bill in a way that might have some unintended consequences. I cannot advise the Committee to accept the new clause. My reason, in a nutshell, is that the new clause is either empty of substance because it merely states the obvious, or it represents an attempt to gloss the convention rights, however slightly, in a way that we have so far avoided doing in our proceedings. We have been careful to avoid doing so, particularly in the clauses that have been added to the Bill in recent months.

There is no disguising the fact that article 14 and the way in which it has been applied are not regarded as fully satisfactory by a number of commentators who have a particular interest in, for example, race equality issues. Its most obvious limitation in their eyes is that it is not a free-standing anti-discrimination provision, but, as the hon. Gentleman said, is parasitic. I do not like that phrase, but essentially it is tied to the other convention rights.

It is no secret that discussions are under way in Strasbourg on the possibility of a new protocol to the convention to introduce a free-standing anti-discrimination provision. That is the right way of dealing with that question—if, indeed, it needs to be dealt with.

Mr. Clappison: I am grateful to the Minister for agreeing with my description of the provision as a parasitic right which would affect other free-standing rights. Does he share my concern that, given that it would affect all the other free-standing rights in the convention, it would create an incentive for individuals who are seeking to take advantage of their alleged entitlement to those rights to plead discrimination, and that we would see a welter of cases involving free-standing rights, in which individuals were pleading discrimination, thus making it difficult for courts to give effect to the convention?

Mr. O'Brien: We shall have to consider that situation in due course. No doubt those who are considering whether there should be a new free-standing provision will have to consider its effect not only on domestic problems in our courts but on the Strasbourg court and the sorts of cases that are brought before it. Clearly, such issues will need to be discussed and probably the best way is to ensure that the UK delegation, which is playing an active in the Strasbourg deliberations on any protocol, bears in mind the impact that it would have on our courts and on the Strasbourg court in deciding whether a free-standing anti-discrimination provision should be forthcoming. Therefore, we should not prejudge the situation that may develop; in a sense, that is what the new clause does.

Mr. Maclennan: I should be grateful if the debate did not go off at a tangent. The new clause is not intended to pre-empt the discussion about the free-standing rights against discrimination. I am aware of those discussions, and I hope that the Government will be supportive of establishing a free-standing anti-discrimination provision. The new clause is designed simply to ensure that the fundamental rights and freedoms that the convention seeks to safeguard are available not just to the limited number of categories of people who are mentioned in article 14, but to those of other status. I am delighted to hear the Minister say that he regards it as common sense that the categories are not closed by these illustrative examples. I agree. I am simply seeking to put the matter beyond argument and doubt.

Mr. O'Brien: But the new clause essentially puts a gloss on the convention and, throughout the Bill, we have tried not to do that. We have tried to grant access rather than create a new gloss on those convention rights. Even in new clause 13, we were careful about that. Our concern is that, with the best of intentions, new clause 10 would not continue that level of care.

I understand the view that may be expressed that, despite, for example, the Sutherland case, the European Court of Human Rights has been somewhat conservative in its judgments concerning article 14, and perhaps too ready to find in favour of states on the ground that there was objective justification for some action which, on its face, might be considered discriminatory. However, whether or not that is so, it is not something we can influence by an amendment to the Bill. Nor do the Government wish to suggest that, in general, our courts should take a different view on the issue from that taken by the European Court.

The Bill is based firmly on the proposition that it is about access to the convention rights, not their substance, and that our courts must take into account the Strasbourg jurisprudence. We cannot honourably pick and choose which rights should be subject to those propositions and which should be open to more generous treatment from the point of view of applicants to our courts.

New clause 10 is an attempt to go some way down that road. It might be seen as an attempt to gloss the convention, encouraging our courts to interpret article 14 more widely than can be justified by reference to Strasbourg jurisprudence. If it does not do that, I fail to see what it does do.

It has been pointed out that, in many ways, new clause 10 merely tries to do for various minorities what other new clauses that the Committee has accepted do for the Churches and the press. I do not think that the parallel is appropriate. Our provision on the Churches emphasises to the UK courts how the Strasbourg institutions have consistently interpreted article 9 rights. It directs the courts' attention to Strasbourg case law, which is to the effect that a Church body or other association with religious objects is capable of possessing and exercising rights contained in article 9 in its capacity as a representative of its members.

Similarly, the provision on freedom of the press is grounded firmly on Strasbourg case law, which encourages the particular importance of the article 10 right to freedom of expression. Moreover, those changes, as well as being wholly in accord with the principles of the Bill and the convention, address concerns of the Churches and the media that the Bill might worsen their position. That consideration does not apply to article 14.

Our reservations about new clause 10 do not imply any lessening of our commitment to combat discrimination. I do not think that anyone has suggested that. We recognise the importance of judges being able to deal with minority groups in a way in which those groups can have confidence. The Judicial Studies Board carries out extensive training involving members of ethnic minorities, for example, in talking to judges to ensure that discrimination does not occur. We think that that is a better way forward. We do not think that adding glosses to the convention at this stage is appropriate or desirable.

I agree with many of the points raised by the hon. Member for Hertsmere, and I will not repeat them. However, the new clause would do something that we have been trying to avoid. It would be a change in the way that we have handled the Bill which should not be acceptable to the Committee. I accordingly invite the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross to withdraw his new clause, in the interests of a Bill which is about granting access to the rights that people should have access to in our courts—but for which, at present, they have to go Strasbourg—rather than about changing the substance of those rights.

Mr. Maclennan: The Minister's reply was rather disappointing, on more than one count. First, he sought to distinguish between the Government's approach in respect of the clauses that dealt with the Churches and the press. Those undoubtedly put a gloss on convention rights and how they were to be enforced in this country, to secure a greater clarity where some powerful interests in the land felt that their interests were at risk.

The Churches had loud voices. The people whom I am seeking to protect in new clause 10, which is modelled on the Government's new clause, do not have such loud voices. They are the disabled, the aged and minorities with differences of sexual orientation. They are not powerful interests. Their interests need the clarity that the Government have been eager to bring in for the Churches and the press.

Secondly, the argument is that this is not an attempt to widen the protections for these groups in any way other than already provided for by the European convention. As I made plain in my initial remarks, it is not to provide a new protection against discrimination at work because that is not covered by the convention. It is designed simply to ensure that access to the protections that the Government claim are in their mind is not debarred because the status of those groups is not specifically mentioned in article 14.

I was glad that the Minister said that it was common sense that the categories were not closed. If we could rely entirely on the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights and the European Commission of Human Rights on this matter, I should be happy to accept his invitation to let it go at that. However, in all the cases that have been considered, the matter has not been concluded. Our courts are not assisted by being pointed to the European courts. They will have to make up their own minds if the matter arises.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The right hon. Gentleman makes my point. He seeks to change the substance of the convention rather than merely clarify things. He is dissatisfied with the way in which the courts proceed and, therefore, seeks to change the substance. He is going beyond anything that we have agreed to do in the Bill so far.

Mr. Maclennan: That is a misinterpretation of what I said. What I am saying is that the courts in Strasbourg have not found it necessary to reach a conclusion on these matters. In several cases, they have decided the issue under another article, although the article 14 rights have been raised. The matter has not been concluded.

The Government claim to be anxious—I do not dispute it—to protect these categories of people against discrimination. As they have subscribed to the Amsterdam treaty provisions, which explicitly mention the appropriateness of European Union member countries offering the protection of our law to those who are disabled or elderly or who might be discriminated against on grounds of sexual orientation, it is perverse not to take this opportunity to put the matter beyond doubt. For that reason, I shall seek to divide the Committee.

A State may make provision in its law for the death penalty in respect of acts committed in time of war or of imminent threat of war; such penalty shall be applied only in the instances laid down in the law and in accordance with its provisions. ## Schedule 3

JUDICIAL PENSIONS

Question proposed, That this schedule be the Third schedule to the Bill.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Schedule 3 makes the provision specified in clause 18(6) about judicial pensions in relation to the holder of judicial office in the UK who serves as a judge of the European Court of Human Rights. It places a duty on the relevant Minister—the Lord Chancellor for a judge serving in England and Wales or Northern Ireland and the Secretary of State for a Scottish judge—to make an order ensuring that a UK serving judge's pension position will not be prejudiced as a result of his or her appointment to the court.

Sir Norman Fowler: We may need a slightly longer exposition of the schedule than the one just given by the Minister. I am suspicious about the fact that the last schedule to a Bill on human rights deals with judicial pensions. I suppose that we are dealing with the human rights of judges, as opposed to those of everybody else. I should like to know a little more about the position on judicial pensions. What are the Government trying to do in the schedule? What is the demand for the measure? Will the Minister say a few words about the cost that is involved?

I should like to ask four straightforward and specific questions. I know that there is not much time left, but I am sure that there is enough time for the Minister to reply to my questions and I am equally sure that he knows the answers. First, will he tell us a little about the schemes? Are they properly funded by employer's and/or employees' contributions, or are they pay-as-you-go? How much is the cost to the taxpayer of the employer's contributions?

[Sir Norman Fowler]

Secondly, how long does the scheme take to mature? The standard final-salary pension scheme is one that matures after 40 years of work, but we assume that not many judges qualify under that criterion. Will the Minister tell us what the qualification is and how many years to maturity a full pension requires? In the schedule, we are protecting the rights under the scheme of a judge who transfers from one place to another, but how long does a judge have to serve to obtain the full pension?

Thirdly, what contributions do the judges have to make and what contributions does the taxpayer have to make?

Fourthly, is the scheme permissive? In other words, is it permissive in the sense of allowing a judge to transfer to a personal pension if that is his wish; or is he tied in to the final-salary scheme as set out at the end of the schedule? If he is able to transfer to a personal pension, will the Government as the employer make the same contribution as would be made to the final-salary scheme?

Those are straightforward, simple questions, to which I am sure that the Minister knows the answers. I should be grateful for any answers, because public money is involved and the taxpayer is involved through employer contributions. The Committee will want to hear a little more explanation than the 30 seconds-worth that the Minister gave at the beginning, given the importance of the matter, not only to judges but to taxpayers generally.

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for raising his questions. Given the enthusiasm with which he put them, I thought that he was concerned that we might have a judicial pensions mis-selling scandal on our hands, but I can assure him that we have nothing like that. The schedule makes statutory provision so that if a judge from the UK courts goes to Strasbourg, his or her pension will be protected. That is all we are doing.

The right hon. Gentleman asked a series of detailed questions about how the judges' pension scheme operates. I shall have a word with my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, and give him all the details. However, we are talking about a relatively small sum of money, used to fund over the next 20 or 30 years the pensions of a couple of judges—unless the right hon. Gentleman expects us to appoint many judges to the Strasbourg court. In the explanatory and financial memorandum to the Bill, under the heading "Financial effects of the Bill", he will see set out clearly:

"The cost will depend on both the number of years served at the Court and the salary of the relevant UK judicial office at the point of retirement."

All that we are doing is ensuring the same sort of pension provision that a judge would get if he served in the UK.

REMEDIAL ORDERS

Orders

1.—(1) A remedial order may—

(a) contain such incidental, supplemental, consequential or transitional provision as the person making it considers appropriate;

(b) be made so as to have effect from a date earlier than that on which it is made;

(c) make provision for the delegation of specific functions;

(d) make different provision for different cases.

(2) The power conferred by sub-paragraph (1)(a) includes—

(a) power to amend or repeal primary legislation (including primary legislation other than that which contains the incompatible provision); and

(b) power to amend or revoke subordinate legislation (including subordinate legislation other than that which contains the incompatible provision).

(3) No person is to be guilty of an offence solely as a result of the retrospective effect of a remedial order.

Procedure

2. No remedial order may be made unless—

(a) a draft of the order has been approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament made after the end of the period of 60 days beginning with the day on which the draft was laid; or

(b) it is declared in the order that it appears to the person making it that, because of the urgency of the matter, it is necessary to make the order without a draft being so approved.

Orders laid in draft

3.—(1) No draft may be laid under paragraph 2(a) unless—

(a) the person proposing to make the order has laid before Parliament a document which contains a draft of the proposed order and the required information; and

(b) the period of 60 days, beginning with the day on which the document required by this subsection was laid, has ended.

(2) If representations have been made during that period, the draft laid under paragraph 2(a) must be accompanied by a statement containing—

(a) a summary of the representations; and

(b) if, as a result of the representations, the proposed order has been changed, details of the changes.

Urgent cases

4.—(1) If a remedial order ("the original order") is made without being approved in draft, the person making it must lay it before Parliament, accompanied by the required information, after it is made.

(2) If representations have been made during the period of 60 days beginning with the day on which the original order was made, the person making it must (after the end of that period) lay before Parliament a statement containing—

(a) a summary of the representations; and

(b) if, as a result of the representations, he considers it appropriate to make changes to the original order, details of the changes.

(3) If sub-paragraph (2)(b) applies, the person making the statement must—

(a) make a further remedial order replacing the original order; and

(b) lay the replacement order before Parliament.

(4) If, at the end of the period of 120 days beginning with the day on which the original order was made, a resolution has not been passed by each House approving the original or replacement order, the order ceases to have effect (but without that affecting anything previously done under either order or the power to make a fresh remedial order).

Definitions

5. In this Schedule—

"representations" means representations about a remedial order (or a proposed remedial order) made to the person making (or proposing to make) it and includes any relevant Parliamentary report or resolution; and

"required information" means—

Clause 1

BASIC INTERPRETIVE PROVISIONS

7.16 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): I beg to move amendment No. 19, in page 2, line 43, leave out from beginning to end of line 4 on page 3.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 48.

Mr. Hoon: The purpose of the amendments is to delete clause 1 (5) and (6) and the associated reference to the definition of "transfer" in the index of defined expressions in clause 71.

Subsections (5) and (6) were originally included in the Bill with the intention that they would help to clarify the somewhat opaque provisions relating to the international movement of personal data in articles 4 and 25 of the directive. In the Bill, we sought to clarify the relationship between those two rules by means of the partial definition of "transfer" in clause 1(5) and the provision in clause 1(6) setting out the application of the geographical scope of provisions in clause 5.

However, those provisions have not met with uniform approval and, on reflection and after listening carefully to further representations, the Government have concluded that there still remains a measure of difficulty about their purpose. Given that the sole reason for the inclusion of the provisions was to clarify the position, the fact that they do not appear to have that effect means that they are plainly unsatisfactory. We cannot immediately see a useful way in which the necessary clarity can be achieved by further amending these subsections, so we have concluded that the best thing would be simply to delete them.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): In Committee, I asked why the subsections were there at all. I made the point that I had been minded to table an amendment to delete them, but had decided that it might be seen as a wrecking amendment. We warmly welcome the Minister's decision. For the avoidance of doubt or confusion, it is better to remove clause 1 (5) and (6) altogether. It says much about the complexity of the legislation that all the best brains in the Home Office cannot find a way of putting on the face of the Bill what the two subsections intend. Imperfect though the legislation will be without them, it will be less imperfect than it would be with them.

Clause 7

RIGHT OF ACCESS TO PERSONAL DATA

Mr. Hoon: I beg to move amendment No. 20, in page 5, line 22, after 'subject' insert

'for the purpose of evaluating matters relating to him such as, for example, his performance at work, his creditworthiness, his reliability or his conduct,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: Government amendments Nos. 21 to 23.

No. 11, in page 5, line 48, after 'otherwise', insert

', and with the proviso that the identity of individuals providing information used by credit reference agencies in supplying trade references for partnerships and sole traders should also be exempted from disclosure.'.

No. 12, in schedule 7, page 57, line 48, at end insert—

'2. In addition, personal data are exempt from section 7 if they consist of the name of the person who has given a reference in confidence for the purpose of assisting a credit reference agency to comment on the creditworthiness of the data subject.'.

Government amendment No. 55.

Mr. Hoon: Amendment No. 20 relates to clause 7(1)(d), which gives individuals the right of access to information about the logic involved when decisions about them are based solely on the automated processing of their personal data. The intention is that, consistent with the directive, the provision should apply only to decision making to which clause 12 applies.

Amendments Nos. 21, 22 and 23 are technical amendments which make more precise the wording of clause 7(2). Amendment No. 55 concerns the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990, which involves detailed provision relating to the collection of, and access to, personal information. In that sensitive area of treatment affecting the very basics of human life, it is important to ensure that those provisions are not in any way undermined by the Bill. The amendment would ensure that the existing position is maintained.

Mr. Greenway: Amendment No. 20 addresses an issue that I raised in Committee, and I welcome it. In one sense, it limits the scope of the duty for data controllers with regard to the logic in automated decisions. However, the inclusion of the words in the amendment, especially those referring to an individual's are beneficial to the Bill, as they make it clear that such key matters are covered and that automated decision taking will not be permitted concerning them.

"performance at work . . . his reliability or his conduct",

I think that amendments Nos. 21 to 23 are drafting amendments. I have had the opportunity of discussing amendment No. 55, concerning embryos, with the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), and I agree that, for the avoidance of doubt, it is probably sensible to remove that passage.

Amendments Nos. 11 and 12 stand in the names of my hon. Friends the Members for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor) and for Poole (Mr. Syms). I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Esher and Walton wishes to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but there has been concern that there should be some exemption from disclosure for the, "identity of individuals providing information used by credit reference agencies in supplying trade references for partnerships and sole traders".

I know that the Government have received several representations on that subject, and the Opposition strongly urge Ministers to keep the issue under review should our amendments not commend themselves to the Government. Several commercial organisations are concerned about the matter, and I hope that the Minister will accept that the Bill as drafted leaves some room for doubt. If it is not to be amended, we ought to have some assurance that the matter will be kept under active review and that perhaps, in two or three years' time, a more formal review will be undertaken.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton): I apologise to the Minister for missing, as I dashed into the Chamber, what must have been his fairly extensive opening remarks. I apologise for my lack of courtesy in that respect, but I am grateful that my Front-Bench spokesman has already mentioned amendments Nos. 11 and 12. I do not intend to speak for more than a moment about them because we discussed the general area in Committee.

In Committee, the Parliamentary Secretary, said that he would consider the subject sympathetically, but the Home Office then redefined the word "sympathetically" to mean that it would consider the subject very cautiously.

I am concerned that, because of the requirement to reveal sources, sole traders, small partnerships and other very small companies may have difficulty in getting credit at all. I believe that there is a general understanding that the subject should be reviewed within three years, and if the Minister is prepared to give me some comfort in that direction, I would not wish to go much further. I want the Government to keep the matter under close review, because, if things went wrong, there could be serious repercussions for very small companies and single traders.

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): I raised this issue a couple of times in Committee, and I know that, since the Minister gave me an assurance at that time, there have been a couple of meetings with the Home Office. I echo the comments that have been made about the need to take the matter seriously and to consider a review.

If the Government are not prepared to accept the amendments, perhaps before the Bill comes back from the Lords they will think about keeping the matter under review. Although the provision affects only a small number of people, it could be crucial for the small business men concerned. I urge the Minister to give further thought to that aspect of the Bill. Under the Consumer Credit Act 1974, special provision was made, which was repeated in the Data Protection Act 1984, and it would be useful to review the issue on a continuing basis.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor) for his comments. He should note that, although my introductory observations may not have been extensive, they were certainly comprehensive. He should also appreciate the fact that it is possible to consider representations sympathetically without necessarily agreeing with them.

The Government have indeed received a number of representations on the subject, and we recognise that the industry's concerns are genuinely held. The question at the heart of the matter is whether the fundamental information privacy right—the right to subject access—should be restricted because of concerns about the future availability of credit.

The arguments presented to the Government so far have not been sufficient to persuade us that the Bill would have the harmful effect on the granting of credit that the industry fears. Therefore, at this stage, the Government cannot accept the amendments. Nevertheless, we recognise that only experience will establish conclusively whether the industry's concerns are justified and, in view of the strength of the concern, I am pleased to give the assurance that the Government will keep the issue under review. We shall reconsider it, in consultation with both the credit industry and small businesses, to see whether the Bill is operating as we intend. I hope that the Opposition will agree that that provides a positive way forward, and will not press their amendments.

Clause 11

RIGHT TO PREVENT PROCESSING FOR PURPOSES OF DIRECT MARKETING

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): I beg to move amendment No. 24, in page 8, line 27, leave out 'requirement' and insert 'notice'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 25, 26, 30 to 32, 39 to 45, 47, 49 to 54, 56 to 67 and 69.

Mr. Howarth: These are essentially minor, technical drafting amendments, and to save the time of the House I do not intend to make a speech about them. However, I should be happy to explain the purpose of any of them, should that be necessary.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 25, in page 8, line 28, leave out 'requirement' and insert 'notice'.—[Mr. McFall.]

Clause 12

RIGHTS IN RELATION TO AUTOMATED DECISION-TAKING

Amendment made: No. 26, in page 9, line 27, leave out from second 'decision' to end of line 28 and insert

'which is not based solely on such processing as is mentioned in subsection (1)'.—[Mr. McFall.]

Clause 14

RECTIFICATION, BLOCKING, ERASURE AND DESTRUCTION

Mr. George Howarth: I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 10, line 30, leave out 'failure' and insert 'contravention'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 28 and 29.

Mr. Howarth: The first of the amendments simply corrects an inconsistency in the drafting of clause 14(4). Paragraph (a) refers to a contravention of the Act. Paragraph (b) refers to a further failure. It should refer to a "further contravention". The amendment makes the necessary change.

Clause 14(4) gives the court the power in certain circumstances to order the erasure, destruction or blocking of personal data. Elsewhere, for example in clause 14(1), the court has the power to order the rectification of personal data as well as their blocking, erasure or destruction. There is no good reason why clause 14(4) should not also allow the court to order the rectification of personal data. Indeed, the directive appears to suggest as much. On reflection, we think that confining the rectification remedy to cases of inaccuracy is unduly restrictive. The amendments add the power to rectify to clause 14(4) and make the consequential provision in clause 14(5); and generally align the wording with that used elsewhere.

7.30 pm

Mr. Greenway: We welcome the amendments. Clause 14 is extremely important in terms of data subject rights. We agree that the court should have the power to rectify information that is inaccurate in respect of data subjects. The three amendments strengthen the Bill in that area, and we are happy to see them incorporated.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 28, in page 10, line 32, leave out 'erasure, destruction or blocking' and insert

'rectification, blocking, erasure or destruction'.

No. 29, in page 10, line 35, leave out 'erasure, destruction or blocking' and insert

'rectification, blocking, erasure or destruction'.—[Mr. McFall.]

Clause 17

PROHIBITION ON PROCESSING WITHOUT REGISTRATION

Mr. George Howarth: I beg to move amendment No. 70, in page 12, line 6, leave out

'section 22 applies to the processing'

and insert

'the processing is assessable processing for the purposes of section 22'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 71 to 82.

Mr. Howarth: I hope to be able to deal quickly with this group of amendments, which makes what is essentially a series of technical improvements to the preliminary assessment provisions in clause 22 and associated provisions. The Bill provides for a limited category of processing, a category where particular worries about data subjects' interests arise, to be assessed by the Data Protection Commissioner for compliance with the principles before it may begin.

That implements the system described in article 20 of the directive as prior checking. It is essentially a system reliant on such processing being brought to the commissioner's attention some time before it actually begins, so that he or she can consider it and give a view. In itself, it is not a direct control on processing. It does not give the commissioner a power to intervene in advance and prevent the processing before any problem has in fact arisen. It remains the data controller's responsibility to address any concerns raised in his own way.

The simplest means of operating this system is through the process of notification. That is why all processing in this limited category, even where it is carried out manually or might otherwise have been exempted from the notification regime, has to be notified. Usually, when a data controller has made a notification, he may start processing immediately. In the limited category that we are now considering, after the processing has been notified, the data controller must wait for a fixed period, or until he has heard from the commissioner if that is sooner, before he may start processing. That is so that he or she can carry out an assessment.

As it stands, the Bill is not as clear as it might be that that is how the system works. The Government are aware that this is a very new feature in our data protection law, being introduced by the Bill as a result of an obligation in the directive. We are also aware that there is an understandable desire among those who might be directly affected for reassurance that the new system will work as clearly and straightforwardly as possible. That is why we have tabled the amendments.

The amendments essentially do three things. First, they make technical changes so that the key provisions in clause 22 are easier to follow and the sequence of events is set out more plainly. The drafting is simplified and made more narrative.

Secondly, the amendments make clearer the relationship between the preliminary assessment itself and the notification that precedes it. The entire operation of clause 22 is now explicitly predicated on the receipt of a notification by the commissioner, and a more distinct link is made between the processing as it is described in the notification and as it falls to be assessed.

Thirdly, both those improvements are carried through to the transitional provisions, where the arrangements are substantially simplified. The provisions on manual and automated data are brought together, and the preliminary assessment system is straightforwardly disapplied in both cases in respect of processing already under way immediately before 24 October 1998.

As I have said, preliminary assessment of this nature is a novelty in UK data protection law. Its purpose is to address understandable anxieties relating to particular categories of data processing. The Government are concerned that, in this sensitive area, the Bill's provisions should be as easy to follow and to operate as possible. These technical amendments make substantial improvements in that direction. I commend them to the House.

Mr. Greenway: In Committee, I made the point that, as the effect of the clause is to prevent the data controller from commencing processing until the Data Protection Commissioner has given consent for that processing, it is crucial that the commercial organisations involved know where they stand. Although I still have reservations about the period specified, I agree with the Minister that the amendments improve the meaning of the legislation. However, I draw attention to the fact that, even at this late stage, we are being asked to approve a large number of technical amendments.

Clause 28

NATIONAL SECURITY

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead): I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 17, line 43, at end insert—

'(13) The relevant Commissioner may—

(a) investigate any procedure which relates to—

(i) the processing of personal data for the purpose of safeguarding national security.

(ii) the application of an exemption which is required for the purpose of safeguarding national security, or

(iii) the signing of a certificate under this section,

(b) make any recommendation which relates to—

(i) an investigation under paragraph (a) of this subsection, or

(ii) safeguarding the interests of data subjects, and

(c) if appropriate—

(i) raise any matter which relates to an investigation in an annual report, or in any other report to the Prime Minister, or

(ii) liaise with the Data Protection Commissioner or another relevant Commissioner on matters which relate to an investigation.

(14) The Data Protection Commissioner may raise with a relevant Commissioner any matter which relates to the processing of personal data for the purpose of safeguarding national security.

(15) In this section, the "relevant Commissioner" means the Commissioner appointed by virtue of—

(a) section 4 of the Security Service Act 1989,

(b) section 8 of the Intelligence Services Act 1994,

(c) section 91 of the Police Act 1997, or

(d) section 8 of the Interception of Communications Act 1985.".

The idea of the amendment is to introduce some element of accountability to the processing of personal data for the purposes of national security. I find it strange, to say the least, that, in certain respects, the Government are offering more privacy protection to members of the mafia and terrorists under investigation by the security services than they are to ordinary law-abiding members of the public—for instance, a data subject who is being positively vetted.

What is more, I am concerned that the Data Protection Act 1984 is being watered down. That Act placed a duty on the security services, by virtue of section 2(2), to comply with the data protection principles. That duty has been removed by this Bill; an exemption under clause 28(1)(a) removes the obligation to comply with the principles.

Under section 27 of the Data Protection Act 1984, personal data held for safeguarding national security are exempt only from the enforcement regime, registration and rights of data subjects. That means that GCHQ and MI5 and MI6 had a legal duty to apply the data protection principles, even though there was no way for the data protection registrar to test whether the duty was complied with. The 1984 Act therefore places those organisations under a moral duty to comply with the principles, but, under the provisions of clause 28, they are permitted to process personal data insecurely, disclose personal data to unauthorised persons, and even sell it to newspapers by virtue of the exemption from clause 55(4).

It may seem a flippant question, but I ask the Minister whether the fees raised by the sale of such unlawfully procured personal data will go into the Consolidated Fund, and how much revenue he expects to be raised in the next financial year.

The Minister might say that MI5, MI6 and GCHQ will not sell unlawfully procured personal data. If that is his argument, why is the exemption in clause 28(1)(c) so wide as to include exemption from clause 55(4), which makes the selling of such personal data an offence? That shows how unnecessarily wide the exemption is with respect to safeguarding national security. Selling misinformation to the newspapers about politicians and perhaps even about the Government will be perfectly lawful for the security services.

In support of my amendment, I draw the attention of the House to some of the differences between warrants and certificates under the Bill. In respect of warrants signed by the Secretary of State—for example, for the interception of communications, or burglary—there is a safeguard, in that such a warrant is signed and validated for six months at a time. By contrast, under the provisions of the Bill, a certificate lasts for ever and is never reviewed.

I note that for warrants under the Interception of Communications Act 1985, there is an obligation under section 6(3) of that Act to discard irrelevant personal information that has been intercepted. Under the Bill, however, the negation of the third and fifth data protection principles means that irrelevant personal data obtained by means of a certificate can be kept indefinitely.

The previous Government gave the security services a new role—to assist the police in dealing with serious crime. The obligations of the police in respect of data protection compliance are apparently not to be required of the security services. The Minister should explain why he has come to that conclusion.

The Government seem to be ignoring the advice of the Data Protection Registrar, who asserts in her document "Our Answers":

"The extension of the role of the Security Service into areas of traditional policing should not carry with it an extension of the exemptions provided by section 27"— the section of the 1984 Act that deals with national security.

There is a significant risk that improper processing of personal data—for example, data obtained by what may be regarded in other circumstances as unlawful means—relating to a serious crime suspect, would not be subject to any data protection rules at all. Such processing can be undertaken by the security services. That could jeopardise the quality of evidence before a court and the subsequent trust placed in it by a jury. If data protection is so thoroughly disregarded, there is a possibility that some serious criminals will not be convicted.

My amendment would go some way towards introducing a smidgen of accountability into the way that the security services process data. It would use the expertise of the commissioners established by section 4 of the Security Services Act 1989, section 8 of the Intelligence Services Act 1994, section 91 of the Police Act 1997 and section 8 of the Interception of Communications Act 1985.

It would be the duty of those commissioners to examine procedures with respect to data protection. They would have powers to investigate any procedure relating to the processing of personal data for the purpose of safeguarding national security; the application of an exemption that is required for the purpose of safeguarding national security; and the signing of a certificate by a Cabinet Minister. The relevant commissioner could make any recommendation relating to that investigation, and make recommendations that were needed to safeguard the interests of data subjects. The proposals in my amendment are no different from the current duties associated with warrants.

[Mr. Harry Cohen]

The amendment would permit the commissioner, if appropriate, to raise any matter that relates to an investigation in an annual report, or in any other report, to the Prime Minister, and to communicate with the Data Protection Commissioner or any other relevant commissioner. That is a pretty moderate amendment.

On 1 June the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) replied to me that the Government

"have decided not to depart from the existing policy that the Security Service should not register any of the personal data they hold under the Data Protection Act 1984."

He went on to say:

"I understand similar considerations also apply to the Secret Intelligence Service and GCHQ."—[Official Report, 1 June 1998; Vol. 313, c. 52.]

However, it is a departure from data protection policy when the security services take on a traditional policing role, and that is against the advice of the Data Protection Registrar. I believe that it is an unwise decision. At the very least, the Minister should explain it to the House.

7.45 pm

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): We have some sympathy with the spirit of the amendment. My noble Friends in another place also tabled amendments on the issue of the security services exemption, because we are concerned about any blanket exemption, where there is no specific justification for exempting data from the data protection principles. The thrust of the Bill derives from European conferences and conversations in which the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department was deeply involved, and which reflected, to some extent, the experiences of the residents of the former East Germany, who had good reason to be suspicious of the way in which their security services held data.

We have been extremely fortunate in this country, in that—apart from the odd rumour that is kicking around—our security services have not generally been held responsible for holding damaging personal data. However, one could argue that the security services hold the most damaging data about individuals. They could leak information about someone, perhaps accusing him of heinous crimes such as being a member of CND or—dare I say it—a socialist. Rumours have circulated only recently that the security services hold information and files on people as prestigious as members of the current Government, and that such information was potentially leakable and potentially damaging.

We applaud the spirit of the amendment, which seeks to ensure that there is some oversight of security services data and that the buck stops with someone who is accountable under the legislation. We look forward to hearing from the Minister how the Bill would cope if damaging, sensitive personal data were revealed and were traced back to a security services source. If a person sought redress for that, we would be interested to hear what channels would be available to him, and how the issue would be resolved.

Mr. Greenway: I have been looking forward to the contribution of the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen). He tabled a great number of amendments for the Standing Committee, but sadly, for reasons that I cannot explain, he was not selected to serve on the Committee, so we were denied the opportunity of hearing from him. However, having listened to the hon. Gentleman, and having considered his amendment No. 13, Conservative Members would oppose its inclusion in the Bill.

We considered this important matter in Committee, and we were at pains to support the Government in requiring that the provision be in the Bill. It is provided for by the directive in article 13 and we believe that, on balance, clause 28 provides an adequate appeal mechanism to the tribunal. While we understand that there are always concerns about such matters, we are not convinced that the House needs to go further in this legislation than the appeal mechanism that is already provided in clause 28.

Mr. George Howarth: My hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen) and the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) tempt me along highways and byways in this debate that it would probably be sensible not to pursue. However, it is important to say at the outset that the Data Protection Act 1984, to which my hon. Friend referred, does not exempt agencies from the data protection principles. Only data users who are required to register are bound by the principles. Section 27 of the 1984 Act provides an exemption from registration where the exemption is needed for national security purposes. That is the exact position.

Consistent with that, clause 28 provides for personal data to be exempted from the main elements of the Bill when that is necessary in order to safeguard national security. The question of necessity is subject to ministerial certification. There is a right of appeal for any person who is directly affected by that certification. The exemptions provided in clause 28 apply only to the extent needed, and a Minister must satisfy himself that the exemptions claimed are in fact required for the purpose of safeguarding national security before issuing a certificate.

The right of appeal against a national security certificate is an important new safeguard. It represents an advance on the 1984 Act, which offered no appeal rights. Appeals will be considered by a specially constituted panel of the data protection tribunal, whose membership will be drawn from the chairman and deputy chairman appointed by the Lord Chancellor and designated by him as being capable of hearing such appeals.

My hon. Friend's amendment would, perversely, have the effect of extending the roles of certain commissioners well beyond those that Parliament intended for them. Commissioners were appointed to carry out certain well-defined and limited functions specifically in relation to the security and intelligence services, the use of intrusive surveillance by the police and the interception of communications. Furthermore, the commissioners' remits by no means cover the whole field encompassed by the national security exemption.

The arrangements set out in clause 28, as drafted, give continued effect to the well-established policy that personal data should be exempt from the main elements of the data protection regime, including supervision by the Data Protection Commissioner, where that is necessary in order to safeguard national security. My hon. Friend chooses not to recognise that the exemption is balanced by the provision for appeals to be made to the tribunal against the issue of ministerial exemption certificates. My hon. Friend's amendment would undermine that policy.

Mr. Cohen: I hear what my hon. Friend has said, particularly in his initial comments. The thrust of my argument is that, under the 1984 Act, the security services have a legal duty to comply with the data protection principles, although they do not have to register. The Bill takes away that duty in the law for security services to comply. Is the Minister saying that I have misread the situation—that the security services still have a duty to comply with the data protection principles and that the 1984 Act has not been weakened in any way?

Mr. Howarth: I apologise if my hon. Friend misunderstood me earlier. The 1984 Act exempts the security services from the principles, and it is important to recognise that fact. In light of my arguments and the necessity for such arrangements, I hope that my hon. Friend will feel able to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Cohen: I will seek to withdraw my amendment, as I hear what the Minister has said. However, I ask him to re-examine his last comment that the 1984 Act did not require the security services to comply with the data protection principles. As I understand it, section 2(2) of part I of the Act requires them to comply with those principles. I ask my hon. Friend to re-examine that point and perhaps clarify the situation in writing. On the basis of my hon. Friend's comments, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 29

CRIME AND TAXATION

Mr. Greenway: I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 17, line 45, after 'prevention', insert 'investigation'.

This is the first of two or three important points that the Opposition wish to raise on Report. The entire Committee stage was characterised by several debates about the importance of safeguarding those organisations, other than the police service and public authorities, whose role is to protect us from the criminal and fraudulent activities of others.

I shall briefly explain the background. The Bill essentially blocks or prevents the processing of sensitive data, including matters relating to criminal convictions and criminal records, other than in the case of certain specific exemptions. The main exemptions with regard to crime are set out in clause 29. Those exemptions are clearly enshrined in article 13 of the directive, which the Bill seeks to implement in our law.

The specific exemption is that personal data may, in certain circumstances, be exempt from the provisions of the Bill if they are processed for the prevention or detection of crime. Article 13 refers not just to the prevention or detection of crime and the prosecution of criminal offences but to the investigation of crime. We believe that the inclusion of the word "investigation" in the Bill will give added comfort to those who undertake risk assessment work in order to combat potential fraud involving credit cards, false insurance claims and so on. Much of that work is of an exploratory nature, when there is no evidence of any crime.

Investigation and detection are two separate activities. For instance, let us suppose that we are talking about a suspicious death. When it is clear that that suspicious death is the result of a murder, the investigation seeks to detect who committed that murder. However, if there is a suspicious death and the investigation seeks to establish the circumstances of that death, it may be discovered that there was no murder at all. However, there is an investigation. Commercial organisations conduct such routine investigations every day in assessing whether certain people are making a succession of fraudulent insurance claims or are involved in credit card or other banking or financial fraud. Many of their investigations conclude that there was no crime committed in a particular case.

As article 13 gives Parliament the opportunity to incorporate the word "investigation" of crime and criminal offences in our legislation, I cannot, for the life of me, understand why the Government are so against including that word. The Minister will argue that that word is superfluous, and that, in the Government's judgment, prevention or detection of crime is adequate. If that is the case, why on earth does the directive allow for the prevention, investigation or detection of crime? Clearly the intention when the directive was drafted was that the word "investigation" would add comfort to the scope of the exemption. Given the seriousness of what we are attempting to provide for, I do not understand why the Government are so against it.

Although we had a lengthy debate in Committee, and although we acknowledge that Ministers have said that they will give other comforts to those organisations—I should state for the sake of the record that the order-making power at paragraph 9 of schedule 3 provides that the Secretary of State may exempt several specific circumstances from a number of provisions—the Bill would be better if it included the word "investigation". That word adds something, and we thought it important for that reason to draw the House's attention to the matter. I ask hon. Members to accept the amendment.

Mr. George Howarth: I hope to convince the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), as he anticipated, that his amendment is unnecessary. Clause 29 sets out specific exemptions that are needed to tackle crime and to collect taxes. They variously affect the fairness and lawfulness principles, subject access, subject information and the non-disclosure provisions. Between them, the purposes set out in subsection (1)(a) and (b) cover the whole process of tackling crime—from measures intended to prevent crime being committed, to the prosecution of an offender if a crime occurs.

The clause does not leave any gaps. The phrases

"prevention or detection of crime"

and

"apprehension or prosecution of offenders" are familiar from the Data Protection Act 1984. They embrace the whole investigative process, which is covered by a combination of "detection", "apprehension" and "prosecution". The investigation of a crime is an activity rather than a purpose. There are a number of purposes for which someone might want to investigate a crime: they might be benign, such as academic research, or not, such as the furtherance of a crime. The hon. Member for Ryedale went some way to acknowledge that point.

[Mr. George Howarth]

The scope of clause 29 is limited to the purposes of law enforcement and public protection. The investigation of a crime in that context is limited in its purposes to the prevention or detection of crime and the apprehension or prosecution of offenders. Those are the only relevant objects of criminal investigation for current purposes, and they are already covered by clause 29.

There is no disagreement between the hon. Member for Ryedale and the Government. The amendment is simply not necessary to achieve the effect that he and I want to achieve. In the light of that, I hope that he will withdraw it.

Mr. Greenway: As the Minister said, I had anticipated his answer, and it was very much the answer that we got in Standing Committee.

Mr. Hoon: Consistent.

Mr. Greenway: It certainly is consistent—and we have been consistent in our argument.

The Minister has not answered on why the word "investigation" appears in the directive but not in the Bill. We must agree to differ, although Conservative Members must take every opportunity to ensure not only that the directive is properly implemented but that the Bill is absolutely clear and as comprehensive as it needs to be.

We clearly disagree, and I thought it right to draw the House's attention to this important issue. Over the past few months, many hon. Members have received letters from the organisations to which I referred about their work in combating fraud and criminal activity. We are disappointed that we cannot persuade the Minister on the amendment, but have no wish to divide the House. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Greenway: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 18, line 1, after 'offenders', insert—

'(ba) the safeguarding of public security,'.

On 22 June, during the Report stage of the Crime and Disorder Bill, there was an important exchange between the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) and the Home Secretary about the extent to which the data protection legislation inhibits the availability and disclosure of information to deal with the vexed problem of football hooligans. I have come across that question before. It was raised seven or eight years ago during the Home Affairs Committee's in-depth inquiry into the policing of football hooligans following the 1990 world cup.

The gist of the problem is that information about certain individuals is available but cannot be disclosed to ferry companies or to organisations and football clubs that are issuing tickets because that would breach the data protection legislation. The Bill gives even more comfort to data subjects in protecting their rights over sensitive information about criminal matters, especially when that information has not been tested in the courts, and even though the football intelligence unit may have been monitoring the behaviour of certain individuals. Those people may not have been prosecuted even though the police are only too well aware that, given half a chance, they would cause mayhem. Sadly, some of our own people, and others, have caused mayhem in France and Belgium over the past two or three weeks. In his response to the hon. Member for Bassetlaw, the Home Secretary acknowledged not only that that is a problem, but that he would like to do something about it, if that was at all possible. The Minister is well aware of that.

I have spent some time considering the extent to which we might improve the position through the Bill. I previously referred to article 13 on the question of the prevention, investigation and detection of crime, which is one of the exemptions permitted in legislation. It also refers to the national security exemption, which the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen) mentioned, and to our defence. Furthermore, it allows national legislation implementing the directive to safeguard public security through an exemption. That is all that we seek: the amendment would safeguard public security, as provided for in the directive. We believe that, if the amendement were accepted, the police would be strengthened and given opportunities to deal with the vexed problem of these louts and hooligans, who have caused so much mayhem and trouble to all of us.

The Minister, who comes from Liverpool, knows exactly the extent to which people in his city are heartily sick of the handful who cause such trouble and give the rest a bad name. We debated this extremely important matter not long ago in the context of the Hillsborough tragedy. We are not making the suggestion glibly as an off-the-cuff solution; it is a sincere and genuine effort to help in the fight against hooliganism, which the entire country wants the Government to tackle.

I cannot see why the measure would create difficulties for the implementation of the directive. If allowing the police an exemption to deal more effectively with football hooligans does not safeguard the peace and tranquillity of the country, I do not know what does. I can think of nothing that has caused as much alarm and concern to those affected as the antics of those mindless lads.

I hope that I have convinced the House that the amendment is extremely important. The Minister may prefer to change the wording. He has tabled a stack of amendments, some of which we have discussed already. The difficulty is that, once we conclude tonight's Report stage and the Bill returns to the other House, the opportunity to amend the Bill will have gone. If the Government accept the amendment tonight, the other place will at least have an opportunity to put it into a more appropriate form of words with which the Government might feel more comfortable. It is 14 years since the House last legislated on data protection; those of us who served on the Standing Committee, and doubtless all the officials and organisations who have had to deal with this complex Bill, hope to goodness that it is at least another 14 years before we do so again. Clearly, we shall not have an early opportunity to do something about this problem in the future, so I hope that the Minister will look favourably on the argument that we have set out and agree to accept the amendment.

Mr. George Howarth: I associate myself with the sentiment behind the amendment. The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) knows from statements that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made that, like him, we consider those hooligans to be a disgrace not just to the part of the world that I come from—Liverpool—but to every town and city in the country. The Government are determined to do all that we can to reduce football hooliganism.

The hon. Gentleman is aware that we are conducting a review of football-related legislation, which will take account of the lessons to be learned from what happened in France. It is clear that we need to consider implementing measures to deal with the football hooligan element who tarnish our reputation abroad. A number of options will be considered, including the ability to restrict those who cause trouble abroad. I know that, in raising these issues, the hon. Gentleman is sincere about what he seeks to achieve.

Home Office Ministers are sympathetic to proposals to have special checks, for example, on recipients of world cup tickets. We have asked the Association of Chief Police Officers sub-committee on disclosure to explore the legality and feasibility of making those checks. People who apply to join the England members club, which is run by the Football Association, are checked against a National Criminal Intelligence Service database, which holds information about persons who are known to be, or suspected of being, involved in organised criminality associated with football. NCIS is registered with the Data Protection Registrar, and the Football Association is listed as a body to which NCIS intends, or may wish, to disclose data.

8.15 pm

Currently, ACPO has agreed that criminal records should be released only for limited purposes—mainly relating to national security, probity in the administration of the law and protection of vulnerable people, especially children. ACPO concluded that there was very significant legal doubt about its ability to release other information, which could not be resolved within the tight time scale. That was a matter not of data protection, but of its powers under the general law. There was also the practical difficulty of how to be sure that the criminal records released related to the people concerned, rather than to others of the same name.

In any event, there would have been further difficulties about compliance with the Data Protection Act 1984 principles of fair obtaining and processing. The Data Protection Registrar was concerned that nothing had been said to people when they applied for tickets in the first instance, and that the check would have been indiscriminate, without regard to suspicion in individual cases. It appeared that the check would have gone much wider than the particular needs of preventing football hooliganism. The FA's desire to check hooliganism was entirely right and proper; the issue was whether that was the right way in which to do it.

The ACPO sub-committee is looking afresh at the issues involved. It was not possible to resolve the issues in the short time available before the world cup, but there is now an opportunity for ACPO, the FA and, as necessary, the Data Protection Registrar to consult about the right approach to be taken in future. It is important to have had this debate, and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Ryedale for raising the issue.

Mr. Greenway: I think that the Minister is about to invite me to withdraw the amendment. I entirely understand why he may not wish to accept it, but can he assure me that if the outcome of the discussions—I am grateful for his offer that we should continue to be part of them—is that an amendment to the legislation is required, there would not be a bar to making such a legislative change?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman makes a reasonable point, and I am anxious to be as constructive as possible. Once all the consultations with the Data Protection Registrar, ACPO and others are complete, we shall be required to take some action. The Government, particularly the Secretary of State, have made it plain that we are committed to taking whatever action is sensible and necessary to eradicate the problem. If data protection principles are involved, that necessarily implies some action in that direction as well. I do not know exactly what the vehicle would be and I do not want to give assurances on that, but the Government certainly wish to take action and I am sure that the whole House would support us. On that basis, I hope that the hon. Gentleman feels able to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Greenway: I am grateful to the Minister. Clearly, there is consensus across the Chamber that what can be done should be done. Given what the Minister has said, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 30

HEALTH AND SOCIAL WORK

Mr. Hoon: I beg to move amendment No. 83, in page 18, line 47, at end insert—

'(1A) The Secretary of State may by order exempt from the subject information provisions, or modify those provisions in relation to—

(a) personal data in respect of which the data controller is the proprietor of, or a teacher at, a school, and which consist of information relating to persons who are or have been pupils at the school, or

(b) personal data in respect of which the data controller is an education authority in Scotland, and which consist of information relating to persons who are receiving, or have received, further education provided by the authority.'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 84 to 91 and the Government new schedule.

Mr. Hoon: Amendments Nos. 83 to 91 and new schedule 1 complete an exercise that was begun in Standing Committee. The Government tabled amendments to bring within the scope of the Bill the records currently covered by the Access to Personal Files Act 1987 and the Access to Health Records Act 1990. The main purpose was to ensure that the arrangements made by the Bill to give effect to the European Court judgment in the case of Gaskin applied to the records covered by the 1987 and 1990 Acts.

The Gaskin judgment deals with subject access requests that are refused because giving the information would identify third parties who have not consented. The judgment says that there must be an independent mechanism for reviewing such refusals. The Bill provides that mechanism by allowing data subjects to go to the commissioner or the courts in such cases.

The purpose of the amendments is to ensure that the judgment is adhered to in the case of records under the Education (School Records) Regulations 1989 and the corresponding Scotland and Northern Ireland legislation. Such records are held by schools on pupils and former pupils. The new schedule gives rights of access to information held in certain unstructured manual records, to which the provisions of the Bill would not otherwise apply. The amendments will bring those records within the scope of the Bill, and thereby give effect to the Gaskin judgment. I hope that the House agrees that the amendments serve a useful and important purpose.

Mr. Greenway: The Gaskin judgment required the Government to introduce a range of amendments to the Bill, most of which were dealt with in Committee. As the Minister said, these are the outstanding amendments. I hope that, when the Bill returns to the other place, they will be accepted as speedily and as graciously as they have been by the Opposition parties tonight and in Committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 84, in page 19, line 16, at end insert—

Clause 34

INFORMATION AVAILABLE TO THE PUBLIC BY OR UNDER ENACTMENT

Mr. Cohen: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 22, line 30, at end insert—

'(2) The Secretary of State may by order, where personal data are held on a public register, lay down conditions which shall be complied with by any person who has access to the register.

(3) An order under this section may make specific provisions with respect to a particular public register.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 5, in clause 67, page 41, line 3, at end insert 'section 34'.

Mr. Cohen: The purpose of the amendments is to enable the Secretary of State to impose statutory conditions to protect lists of shareholders, the electoral roll and other public registers. Publicly available registers are unprotected. They are wide open to abuse, and, in most cases, there is no control over who has access to them or how they are used. On 22 April 1997, The Times noted that the Mayfair rapist selected his rich victims from the electoral roll.

I note from my recent parliamentary questions to all Government Departments that several Ministries are not sure for what public records they are responsible. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions said that information on what public records it was responsible for was not held centrally. That is astonishing. Several public registers are not actually publicly available. The Home Office keeps a register of forensic pathologists that is available to the public, which is useful information for criminals to access.

Public registers get scant protection under the Bill. The most familiar example of a public register is the electoral roll, copies of which can be obtained by any person for any purpose. Electoral registration officers have no discretion on whether to provide information, even to the most disreputable of characters. The position on data protection and the electoral roll is intolerable.

Mr. Allan: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the recent confusion about whether electoral registration officers can give access to the register in computerised as opposed to paper form? It is a problem for political parties if they cannot obtain access to the computerised form. We are interested to know how that will be dealt with in the Bill. Both the paper and the computerised form will be covered by data protection principles.

Mr. Cohen: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. The way things are going, I suspect that the computerised form and other forms will be available to whoever wants them.

Data subjects are obliged by law to provide names and addresses; failure to do so could result in a hefty £400 fine. Any person can obtain a copy of those details without the data subject being informed. Under clause 34, the electoral returning officer, as data controller, has no obligation to inform data subjects about who has accessed the register. A clear condition could be imposed that those who access the register should be required to identify themselves, and that list could be publicly available.

I am in favour of certain limits on public registers. For example, the electoral roll should be used only for electoral purposes, unless the elector consents to its use for other purposes. However, I recognise that many organisations have developed goods and services businesses on the basis of this publicly available information. My amendment would not stop any misuse directly: it would merely provide a mechanism to permit the Secretary of State to protect the public should the need arise, and to introduce new rules gradually, so that, if appropriate, such organisations could adjust their practice and be weaned off public sources of information over a period.

Paragraph 11(c) of schedule 8 delays the implementation of the eighth principle on the transfer of personal data abroad for personal data currently processed from the electoral register. As far as I can see, that provision negates any protection afforded by paragraph 14 of part II of schedule 1. If the eighth principle does not apply, it is difficult to see how the Secretary of State can define restrictions by order.

MPs usually live and vote in their constituency. Under the provision in schedule 8, there is nothing to prevent Saddam Hussein or any terrorist or malicious person from being able to purchase copies of the register, in computerised form, to find out where MPs or other well-known individuals live. Admittedly, it is a crude method. Because of his common surname, my right hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) might evade detection. However, one wonders how many people appear on the electoral roll with the surname of my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Stinchcombe) or of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Öpik). Someone might even look up the name Beckham for malicious purposes. Will the Minister explain why data protection legislation seems to expose MPs and others in the public eye to that risk?

After the passage of the Bill, the Minister should take a co-ordinated look at how public registers are kept, who has access to them and what uses are permissible.

Mr. Hoon: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen) for allowing us to have this short debate, which will be of assistance. He is concerned about clause 34, which performs an important function. It ensures that certain key provisions of the data protection regime do not conflict with the rules relating to information that is required by statute to be made public.

As my hon Friend's amendments recognise, the provision is essentially about public registers. He gave a number of examples: the registers of births, marriages and deaths, registers held by Companies House, the electoral register, and so on. The essential feature of all those registers, which is recognised in clause 34, is that they are all governed by their own discrete legislation.

Those statutes will determine the detailed conditions that apply to the information contained in the registers. They will cover matters such as the nature of the information contained in the registers, the conditions governing access to the registers, the accuracy of the information, and so on.

The purpose of clause 34 is to ensure that the detailed rules of the specific statutes, rather than the general data protection rules governing the registers, determine those matters. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that that is sensible. The information contained in the registers is collected for a specific and particular purpose. It is much more appropriate for the specific statute to determine the relevant conditions that apply than for the general data protection legislation to do so. That is not to say that the data protection rules do not apply at all. To the extent that the data protection principles, and other provisions of data protection law, are not dealt with expressly in the specific statutes, they will apply. That is the position under the 1984 Act, and it will be maintained in the Bill.

8.30 pm

I remind my hon. Friend that clause 34 does not provide an exemption for the subsequent use of data collected from the registers. To the extent that any of those who obtain personal data from public registers process those data in a way that would be caught by the Bill, they would have to comply in full with the requirements set out in the Bill.

My hon. Friend wants to go a little beyond that. He wants to provide the Secretary of State with the power to specify conditions governing access to specific public registers. I hope that I have made it clear why the Government do not believe that that is the right approach. Moreover, I invite my hon. Friend—who I know is extremely knowledgeable on this matter—to consider how his proposed new arrangements would be enforced. Not all those seeking access to the registers would become data controllers, so the conditions could not be enforced through the various mechanisms set out in the Bill. Again, that argues for the conditions applying to particular registers to be set by the parent enactments—if I may use that phrase—which will be able to make suitable arrangements for enforcement.

I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that that is the right way forward, and that it is better for these issues to be dealt with in the specific context of the Acts that deal with registers rather than in the context of wider data protection legislation. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing the matter to the attention of the House, but I invite him, in the light of what I have said, to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Cohen: My hon. Friend is right in saying that I want to go further and impose more general data protection controls on public registers. However, I acknowledge that he has made some good points, so I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 40

ENFORCEMENT NOTICES

Mr. Cohen: I should like to speak to amendment No. 1, in page 23, line 32, to leave out "the fourth" and insert "any". However, I welcome the Government amendments that have been grouped with it, which,

[Mr. Cohen]

I think, accept the points that I wanted to make. The rights granted by article 12 (b) and (c) of the European directive, as established by the Bill, should apply to all the data protection principles, and not only to the fourth principle, as originally proposed, so that unlawful and unfairly obtained data—not only inaccurate data—are covered.

There was a danger that the Bill would not implement the data subject's rights under those two articles of the directive, which would also have meant a lessening of protection for data subjects under the Data Protection Act 1984. I welcome the Government amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that he is not moving amendment No. 1?

Mr. Cohen: Yes. I am prepared not to move it, as I accept the Government amendments.

Amendments made: No. 33, in page 23, line 33, leave out 'may' and insert

'which requires the data controller to rectify, block, erase or destroy any inaccurate data may also'.

No. 34, in page 23, line 34, leave out 'any inaccurate data and'.

No. 35, in page 23, line 36, leave out 'or' and insert—

'(3A) An enforcement notice in respect of a contravention of the fourth data protection principle'.

No. 36, in page 23, line 39, leave out from 'party' to second 'to' and insert

'may require the data controller either—

(a) to rectify, block, erase or destroy any inaccurate data and any other data held by him and containing an expression of opinion as mentioned in subsection (3), or

No. 37, in page 24, line 2, leave out from 'notice' to 'or' in line 4 and insert

'requires the data controller to rectify, block, erase or destroy any personal data'.

No. 38, in page 24, line 6, leave out 'were inaccurate' and insert

'had been processed in contravention of any of the data protection principles'.—[Mr. Hoon.]

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 24, line 28, at end insert—

'(7A) The Commissioner shall maintain a register containing—

(a) a copy of every enforcement notice issued under this section;

(b) such other particulars relating to such notices as the Secretary of State may by order prescribe.

(7B) The provisions of sections 19(6) and (7) shall apply in relation to the register maintained under this section as they do in relation to the register maintained under section 19(1).'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 16, in clause 42, page 25, line 20, at end insert 'and may, if he considers it appropriate, inform any other person'.

No. 17, in clause 59, page 36, line 44, leave out

'necessary for reasons of substantial' and insert 'in the'.

Government amendment No. 46.

No. 18, in page 36, line 44, leave out 'substantial'.

Mr. Shepherd: The amendments reflect concern about a new prohibition on the release of information in clause 59, which would make it an offence for the Data Protection Commissioner or her staff to disclose information about any identifiable business or individual other than in very limited circumstances. The offence would be committed even if the disclosure caused no harm to commercial confidentiality, for example. No such offence exists under the Data Protection Act 1984.

The provision is likely to prevent the commissioner from publicly identifying businesses that have been found to be misusing personal data about individuals by obtaining data through deception, for example, or by selling private information for commercial purposes. The commissioner may be unable to reveal that she has received large numbers of complaints about a particular company, that a company has failed to respond to requests to improve its practices or that an enforcement notice has been served against a firm. Equally, it may be an offence to reveal that a business has agreed to correct a problem without formal action, or that a complaint had proved unfounded.

The registrar has expressed concern at the new provision, which she says may require her and her staff to be unnecessarily guarded in future. The result may be both to deny the public information that they should have and to undermine public confidence in the commissioner's work, by preventing her from explaining what action she has taken to deal with complaints relating to matters of public concern.

The offence is not limited to disclosures likely to cause actual harm, but will be caused by any disclosure of any information about an identifiable business. That contradicts the policy established by the previous Government, whose 1993 White Paper on open government provided that, in any new offences involving the disclosure of information,

"the presumption will be in favour of the inclusion of a harm test".

It is also inconsistent with this Government's proposals for a freedom of information Act. The freedom of information White Paper proposes that information should be withheld only where disclosure would cause either harm or substantial harm to specified interests. Existing statutory restrictions on disclosure are being reviewed with a view to repealing or amending those that do not reflect the proposed harm test.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) tabled an amendment to restrict the offence to information that is potentially damaging. The amendment was not accepted. The Government say that the new offence is required by the European data protection directive, which states that national supervisory authorities must be subject to "a duty of professional secrecy".

However, the registrar's view, as expressed in January, is that that obligation can be met without the creation of a new criminal offence. Moreover, the directive contains a number of pro-disclosure provisions, which would permit a far more balanced approach. They include recital 72, which states that

"this Directive allows the principle of public access to official documents to be taken into account when implementing the principles set out in this Directive", and recital 63, which states that supervisory authorities

"must help to ensure transparency of processing".

The Government maintain that the restriction is not as serious as it seems, as the commissioner has a discretion to release information under clause 51(2), which states:

"The Commissioner shall arrange for the dissemination in such form and manner as he considers appropriate of such information as it may appear to him expedient to give to the public about the operation of this Act, about good practice, and about other matters within the scope of his functions under this Act".

However, precedent under similar provisions suggests that that may be of limited value.

For example, the Health and Safety Commission and Executive are prohibited from disclosing information unless it is for the purposes of their functions, but they are required to ensure that people concerned with matters relevant to the purposes of the Health and Safety at Work Act, etc. 1974 are "kept informed of, and adequately advised on"

those matters. The HSC and HSE interpret those two requirements restrictively, and say that they are prohibited from revealing information about individual premises unless to do so would directly prevent risk, or is necessary to protect health and safety. Requests for information about identifiable premises from people who are not themselves in danger, including Members of Parliament, researchers and journalists, are usually refused. The explicit prohibition on releasing information about identifiable businesses is therefore likely to override the commissioner's general discretion to release information, unless, under clause 59(2)(c),

"the disclosure is made for the purposes of, and is necessary for, the discharge of . . . any functions under this Act".

It would be extremely difficult to demonstrate that a particular disclosure was necessary for any function under this Act. If the function can be discharged without the disclosure, the disclosure will not be necessary, and, indeed, will be illegal.

Clause 59(2) permits disclosure in certain other limited circumstances—for example, when the information is already publicly available, when the individual or business concerned consents to the disclosure and when disclosure is made in connection with legal proceedings. The subsection also provides for a limited, highly restrictive, public interest defence.

The amendments would require the commissioner to maintain a public register of enforcement notices, whose disclosure might otherwise constitute an offence. They would permit—but not require—the commissioner to reveal the results of an assessment of whether a particular business was complying with the legislation. At present, that information can be revealed only to the person who asks for the assessment, and its disclosure to a Member of Parliament or a journalist could be an offence. The amendments also attempt to strengthen the public interest defence available to the commissioner or her staff.

Let me deal first with amendment No. 15. Under clause 41, the commissioner may serve an enforcement notice when it appears to her that a data controller is contravening any of the data protection principles. The notice may require the controller to take specified action or to stop processing data. The amendment requires the establishment of a register of such notices, as is made clear in new subsection (7A), which would have to be available to the public, free of charge, at all reasonable times. Certified copies of entries could be obtained on payment of any prescribed fee. That is provided for by new subsection (7B), which applies the existing provisions of clause 19(6) and (7), relating to the data protection regime.

The amendment would bring the Bill into line with existing legislation, such as the Environment and Safety Information Act 1988 and the Environment Protection Act 1990, which require the establishment of public registers of enforcement notices about environmental and safety hazards. Paragraph (b) of new subsection (7A) would allow the Secretary of State, by order, to require other information relating to such notices to be included in the register. That would allow the fact that a notice had been cancelled under clause 41, or was the subject of an appeal under clause 48, to be recorded; it might also permit the person on whom the notice had been served to add a statement of explanation or mitigation to the register.

Amendment No. 16 refers to clause 42. Under clause 42(1), a person who believes that he or she has been directly affected by any processing of personal data may ask the commissioner for an assessment of whether that processing breaches the Act's requirements. After carrying out the assessment, the commissioner must inform the applicant, to the extent that she considers appropriate, of "any view formed or action taken as a result".

That is in clause 42(4)(b).

8.45 pm

However, while the applicant must be informed of the outcome, the commissioner may commit an offence under clause 59 by revealing the same information to any other person. Thus, although there may have been a well-publicised complaint about a particular practice, the commissioner may not tell anyone—including a journalist, a Member of Parliament or another potentially affected person—about her findings. The amendment allows, but does not require, the commissioner to make such disclosures; however, a requirement may arise under the proposed freedom of information Act.

The discretion is appropriate in this instance. When a complaint relates purely to the circumstances of an individual applicant, wider disclosure may not be appropriate; but when the issue is of general concern and affects a large number of people, disclosure may be justified—if, for example, it reveals that a bank is failing to safeguard personal data about its customers.

There is no reason why the level of disclosure proposed in the amendment should be thought to contravene the obligation of professional secrecy required by the directive, given that the directive also provides that supervisory authorities

"must help to ensure transparency of processing".

Let me now deal with amendment No. 17. A public interest test is available under clause 59(2)(e) should the commissioner, or a member of her staff, be prosecuted for an offence relating to the disclosure of information.

[Mr. Shepherd]

The test is particularly restrictive, and amendments Nos. 17 and 18 seek to remove some of the restrictive features. Clause 59(2)(e) provides that no offence is committed if

"having regard to the rights and freedoms or legitimate interests of any person, the disclosure is necessary for reasons of substantial public interest."

That means that it would have to be established that the disclosure was "necessary", not just desirable, in the public interest, and that the public interest related to the "rights and freedoms or legitimate interests" of others. That term does not, on the face of it, acknowledge the public interest in the accountability of the commissioner's work. Moreover, the public interest itself would have to be "substantial".

It is hard to see why that public interest test should be set down so strictly, particularly as most of the Bill's other public interest tests are less demanding. For example, there is no requirement that the public interest be "substantial" before a newspaper can publish personal data under the public interest test in clause 32(1)(b).

Amendment No. 17 would remove the requirement that the disclosure be "necessary" and that the public interest be "substantial". The defence, as amended, would read:

"having regard to the rights and freedoms or legitimate interests of any person, the disclosure is in the public interest."

Amendment No. 18 and Government amendment No. 46 cover similar ground. Amendment No. 18 is an alternative to amendment No. 17. It would delete the word "substantial" in clause 59, but would retain the word "necessary". The amended clause would then read:

"having regard to the rights and freedoms or legitimate interests of any person, the disclosure is necessary for reasons of public interest."

The wording is effectively identical to amendment No. 46, tabled by the Home Secretary. Under that amendment, the clause would read:

"having regard to the rights and freedoms or legitimate interests of any person, the disclosure is necessary in the public interest."

I hope that the Government will withdraw their amendment and support mine, because the word "necessary" would remain a problem with both amendment No. 18 and amendment No. 46. A disclosure that was "desirable" in the public interest, but not "necessary", would not be permitted under those amendments. There is an important distinction between the two, and I hope that the Government will accept my amendments.

Mr. Greenway: My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) very adequately set out the concerns of the Data Protection Registrar. I tried to impress on the Government the importance of several concerns about the provisions that create the offence of unlawful disclosure of information by staff. People who are only doing their job may find themselves committing a criminal offence. The House must be sure that the legislation provides for that criminal offence only when it is strictly necessary.

I was disappointed in Committee that the Government did not accept the harm test to which my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills referred. There seems to be an inequality in the public interest test, in that the word "necessary" will apply to this provision, even when the Government amendments are made, but not to other exemptions in the Bill. I cannot for the life of me understand why staff who are only doing their job should be subject to a greater hurdle than others when disclosure is accidental, especially as some of the exemptions, as in clause 32, are extremely wide.

I hope that the Minister will acknowledge that those are genuine concerns. If Government amendment No. 46 is made, it would at least allow the other place to return to the matter when it considers our amendments. With that in mind, it may not be too late for the Government to reconsider the word "necessary", to which my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills so rightly referred.

Mr. George Howarth: I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) for his hard work and the good advice that he often takes on these matters. His concern about confidentiality of information is well recognised and respected, and he moved the amendment very much in that spirit.

Clause 40 is a key part of the Bill. It enables the commissioner to issue enforcement notices requiring compliance with data protection principles. Amendment No. 15 would require the commissioner to maintain a register of enforcement notices, to be accessible in much the same way as the main register of data controllers' notifications provided for in clause 19.

The idea of keeping a public record of enforcement notices has been suggested in the past, and we are not unsympathetic to it in principle. I understand that the Data Protection Registrar herself has expressed some interest in such a record, as the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills said.

It was with such an idea in mind that the Government tabled an amendment in Committee to add clause 19(2)(b), allowing the Secretary of State, by notification regulations, to authorise or require the commissioner to include in the register of notifications maintained under that clause certain information in addition to the basic registrable particulars.

It would be possible to use the provision to add information about enforcement notices to the register. Under clause 25, the commissioner can make proposals for the content of notification regulations. The Government look forward to hearing the commissioner's views and will consider the issue further in that context. Against that background, I invite the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment No. 16 would explicitly allow the commissioner to tell any other person, as well as the originator, the outcome of a request for assessment of the compliance of any particular processing with the provisions of the law. I recognise that the provision is discretionary, but I do not think it appropriate for the legislation to be framed in that way.

Requests for assessment may deal with essentially private matters—that is, private either to the data subject or to the data controller. More fundamentally, such requests are at most preliminaries to enforcement action, and they may come to nothing, as there may be perfectly good answers to the questions. I am not in favour of any general presumption in favour of releasing the results of assessments. That is not to say that they might not emerge in one form or another under other parts of the Bill.

Clause 51 places general duties on the commissioner to promote good practice and to disseminate material that she considers appropriate, about the operation of the Act, good practice and any other matters within the scope of his functions. Anonymised information from assessments may appear in one of those contexts, and the result of any assessment may be quoted in enforcement proceedings.

I do not think that a power at large, qualified only by the general term "appropriate", fits what we need in this targeted legislation. Release of information when it serves a particular purpose is fine; but otherwise, just as we have to be careful with the interests of data subjects, we have to be careful with the interests of data controllers. I invite the hon. Member for Aldridge–Brownhills to reflect on the provisions of clause 51 and not to press to a vote amendment No. 16, which is a general amendment to clause 42.

Clause 59 is an important and, I accept, difficult provision. It is important because it discharges the obligation on us to ensure that the supervisory authority—the Data Protection Commissioner and her staff—are subject to a duty of what the directive calls "professional secrecy", in respect of the confidential information to which they have access.

We have found it difficult to get the provision right. Our original proposal in another place was criticised by the Data Protection Registrar, and we revised it on Report there, but we could not, and still cannot, accede to pressure to remove it; the directive requires us to have a statutory provision, which needs to be enforceable through a criminal sanction.

We have considered the detail further in the light of representations, not least from the hon. Members for Aldridge-Brownhills and for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), and of the Government's own commitment to freedom of information legislation, which the former hon. Gentleman rightly prayed in aid for his argument.

Clause 59 states that one way in which a disclosure may be made with lawful authority is if,

"having regard to the rights and freedoms or legitimate interest of any person, the disclosure is necessary for reasons of substantial public interest."

Government amendment No. 46 replaces that with a simple test of necessity in the public interest. I hope that the hon. Member for Aldridge–Brownhills will accept that that goes further in the direction of freedom of information, while still complying with the directive. That is a difficult balance, but amendment No. 46 achieves it.

Amendments Nos. 17 and 18 go in much the same direction, as the hon. Gentleman said. I prefer the Government's wording, for two reasons. First, it maintains the necessity test, which is important for an exemption from the directive's requirements. Secondly, our words are simpler. "In the" rather than "for reasons of" is a simpler way to express the point. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be willing to withdraw his wording in favour of ours.

The hon. Gentleman argued that clause 59 could, perhaps, go further, and we did consider whether there was further scope for easing the restrictions that the clause imposes, while keeping it consistent with the directive. So far, we have been unable to find a way to do that, but we shall certainly continue to have regard for that point as we continue our work on freedom of information. If we can identify any way in which restrictions can properly be eased, we shall bring forward any necessary amendment in freedom of information legislation. There is scope to revisit the point within that framework, provided that we can find a suitable way to achieve what the hon. Gentleman and the Government want.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that that is a considered response to his concerns, and that he will feel able to withdraw the amendment, safe in the knowledge that we recognise his concerns and are aware of the possibility of revisiting the point at a later stage.

9 pm

Mr. Shepherd: I am extremely disappointed by that reply. I took the trouble to provide the Government with my notes for the debate, and I thought that they would address the issues raised in those notes. However, they have not done so. I thought that there were some benefits in my approach. I was being helpful on the White Paper. There is a muddle, and there is grave concern about how matters interrelate, so I was trying to set out the position. I was also trying to state clearly the anxieties expressed by the Data Protection Registrar, Mrs. France, and by professionals in the field.

I was trying to assist the Government by preventing the need for this business to return to the House once the Lords have amended the Bill along my lines. There is one simple problem in both the Government's amendment and my amendments. My argument is that "necessary" would remain a problem under the amendments. Amendment No. 18 was my fallback position, and I was pleased to see the Government withdraw the substantial point. However, "necessary" is being retained, and that reminds me of my experience under Governments of my own party and their unwillingness to yield once Government amendments had been set out. "Necessary" will remain a problem. A disclosure merely desirable, but not necessary, in the public interest would not be permitted under amendment No. 46. The Minister simply has not addressed that point, although it is of the essence. Perhaps he will consult his colleagues and the civil servants in their Box.

I would gladly not press amendment No. 18 if the Government would not press amendment No. 46. Then we would have a good raft of amendments that would satisfy the House of Lords. We could prevent the need for the matter to come back.

Mr. George Howarth: I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman; I hold him in the highest regard. I did not have the opportunity to read the notes that he sent to the Home Office, and I apologise for that. I do not believe, however, that his concerns need to be dealt with in the way he states, because the Government amendments go far enough. I will be sorry if the hon. Gentleman does not feel able to withdraw his amendment. He will be able to revisit the matter, as will the House, under the general heading of freedom of information.

I am loth to say more because I sat through long hours of debate on the Maastricht treaty, and I know of the hon. Gentleman's enormous potential to speak again with alarming frequency and great lucidity. I am desperately anxious not to tempt him to do so.

Mr. Greenway: The House is in a dilemma. We have only the prospect that the Government's amendment is likely to be carried, and we have to face that reality. Yet that amendment includes the word "necessary" and I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) that that word is not required. I am being helpful to the Minister when I say that the House can only accept the Government amendment, but the Government must expect that amendment to be amended in the other place because my hon. Friend's arguments are extremely valid.

The word "necessary" is unnecessary. It is not applied in other parts of the Bill. The only opportunity open to us now is to accept the Government amendment. If the House does so, I ask the Government to think again so that when the Bill goes to the other place the word "necessary" can be deleted.

Mr. Shepherd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), and I am concerned.

I made out a case which I tried to get to the Whips because I understand the urgency with which the Government have to manage their programme. These were detailed arguments, but they were not addressed in detail. I am genuinely disappointed by the points made about the word "necessary". I hope that the House will have to return to the matter; the Lords will take an interest in this.

The Government moved favourable amendments—I congratulate them on that—as a consequence of the Lords taking a view on certain parts of the Bill. I have no doubt that our liberty is in the interstices of the details of Bills such as this. The matter is extremely important which is why I should have liked a more sympathetic response. The Government have moved some of the way, but I ask them to reflect on what that simple word "necessary" means to the burden of the argument as contained in the clause. Accordingly and with the advice and guidance of my good and hon. Friend, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

THE DATA PROTECTION PRINCIPLES

Amendments made: No. 51, in page 47, line 13, after 'where' insert 'at that time'.

No. 52, in page 47, line 15, leave out

'information contained in the data is'

and insert 'data are'.

No. 53, in page 47, line 16, leave out

'information contained in the data is'

and insert 'data are'.—[Mr. George Howarth.]

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 48, line 40, at end insert—

'9A. The data controller must take reasonable steps to ensure that any computer system used in processing the personal data is capable of dealing accurately with dates later than 31st December 1999.'.

The amendment is a response to the situation facing many computer systems in Britain, and even more so world wide, on the failure to recognise the year 2000, which the Prime Minister has dubbed the millennium bug. It seeks to introduce a statutory obligation on data controllers to ensure that computer systems are millennium compliant, thus ensuring that the personal data that they contain are fully protected from any problems arising from the century date change and the year 2000 being a leap year. [Laughter.] I do not know why that is funny, but no doubt the Minister will enlighten me when he replies.

I hope that the House knows what I am talking about. This is an issue to which I have drawn attention and about which I have warned on several occasions since my initial question to the then Prime Minister in December 1995, following which I introduced an Adjournment debate and have since introduced two private Member's Bills on the issue.

Mr. White: The hon. Gentleman will know that a number of dates in 1999, including 31 December 1999, may cause problems to certain computers. Why does not the amendment cover all the problem rather than just part of it?

Mr. Atkinson: The hon. Gentleman is obviously an expert on the issue, so he will know that for computer systems to be millennium compliant they will also take account of the problems anticipated before the turn of the century.

The office of the Data Protection Registrar has produced a two-page paper entitled "The Millennium Bomb" which states that there are two problems whenever a two-digit year, represented as 99, changes to 00. It says that personal data may be interpreted as relating to 1900 rather than 2000—that is, the date is out by 100 years—and that the year 2000 is a leap year which is not usually the case for a centenary year.

If computer systems are not millennium compliant, a number of basic data protection issues emerge. Inaccurate personal data may be processed. Obviously, therefore, the provisions of the Bill that relate to accuracy—the fourth principle—and those relating to compensation for damage caused through the use of inaccurate personal data, come into play. There may be unfair processing. If the processing is date dependent—for example, age-dependent calculations—it may give inaccurate results and lead to the deletion of personal data before the planned retention time has expired.

Such eventualities would appear to breach the first principle in the Bill—providing for personal data to be processed fairly. It can result in the irretrievable loss of data, destroyed prematurely, as well as circumstances in which personal data are lost temporarily—for example, personal data that are unavailable for processing while the problem is being fixed. That appears to breach the seventh principle, relating to the loss, destruction of or damage to personal data.

Many more concerns were drawn to the attention of the Science and Technology Select Committee during its investigation of this issue, on which it reported to the House on 7 April. The report was called, "The Year 2000—Computer Compliance".

The Minister may argue that my amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. Hoon: Very good.

Mr. Atkinson: It appears that I have anticipated the Minister. He may argue that because the seventh principle requires:

"Appropriate technical and organisational measures shall be taken against unauthorised or unlawful processing of personal data and against accidental loss or destruction of, or damage to, personal data."

I hope that he does not use that defence, which would be an inadequate response to a unique issue relating to computer systems and the data that they process and the protection of that data for which the Bill provides. Nor would it reflect the Government's clear warnings that the problem is serious and must be addressed if we are to avoid serious difficulties.

As the need for computer systems to be millennium compliant is so obvious and serious, it should be mentioned in as many words in the legislation. That is why I propose a new paragraph in schedule 1 which states:

"The data controller must take reasonable steps to ensure that any computer system used in processing the personal data is capable of dealing accurately with dates later than 31st December 1999."

I hope that the Government will have the foresight to accept my amendment.

9.15 pm

Mr. Hoon: The amendment raises an issue of great topicality. The House is grateful to the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) for allowing us to have this brief debate on the data protection implications of the year 2000 problem. He is worried that there may be a risk to personal data processed in computer systems that have not been not programmed to cope properly with the change of date at the end of the millennium. If the problem is as serious as he warns, there could be a risk of corruption of data held on computer systems.

The hon. Gentleman invites the House to amend the Bill expressly to deal with that risk. As he anticipated, however, the Government do not believe that such an amendment is appropriate. We believe that the seventh data protection principle and paragraph 9 of part II of schedule 1, already make adequate provision. They ensure that the data controller must take appropriate technical and organisational measures to ensure the required level of security. The requisite level has to be appropriate to the harm that might result from, among other things, accidental loss or destruction of, or damage to, personal data. That appears to cover the entire range of eventualities that might occur to personal data as a consequence of some failure of a computer system because of the year 2000 problem.

Problems of this sort could presumably occur for reasons other than the ending of the millennium. The formulation in paragraph 9 is intended to cover the unfortunate consequences that might occur from any failure of a computer system, whether or not it occurs as a consequence of the year 2000 problem. In the light of what I have said, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that his amendment is unnecessary and will feel able to withdraw it.

Mr. David Atkinson: I am disappointed that the Government have not recognised the value of my amendment and surprised at the flippant way in which the Minister responded. I am surprised because of the prominence that the Government are trying to give the issue, especially since the Prime Minister's speech on 30 March warning of the consequences to the nation if we do not get it right. I am especially surprised because the Minister has been aware of the issue for longer than any other Minister because he was Labour's spokesman on it before Labour became the Government on 1 May last year.

If computer systems are not millennium compliant, there will be problems. The privacy of information contained in computer systems will be at risk if they crash because they are not millennium compliant. That is something which few people realise. It appears from what the Minister has said that he and the Government have not yet grasped the issue with the seriousness that it deserves.

By ignoring the opportunity that my amendment provides, the Government have missed a valuable opportunity. They are showing amazing complacency on the issue. I appreciate that my amendment was tabled only early this week, so perhaps Ministers have not given serious thought to this aspect of the Bill. I hope that the Government will give my proposal further thought in the other place.

I clearly have not persuaded the Government, but I hope that they will give it further thought. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 54, in page 48, line 42, leave out 'staff' and insert 'employees'.—[Mr. Hoon.]

Schedule 3

CONDITIONS RELEVANT FOR PURPOSES OF THE FIRST PRINCIPLE: PROCESSING OF SENSITIVE PERSONAL DATA

Mr. Greenway: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 51, line 7, at end insert—

'4A. The information contained in the personal data has been obtained by the canvassing of data subjects by registered political parties.'.

It may come as a surprise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to learn that the Bill would make the processing of personal data obtained from political canvassing illegal. There are some of us who think that if all political canvassing were banned, it would save us an awful lot of toil and sweat at election time, but in reality—the Under-Secretary and I have discussed the matter—we appreciate and recognise that it is important that the problem that the Bill presents is tackled.

I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney), who first drew attention to the matter when we were considering our response to the Bill. As a former chairman of the Conservative party, he understands and appreciates the importance of electoral law and of ensuring that the data protection legislation does not unnecessarily restrict or prohibit proper canvassing of political opinion by political parties.

When we discussed the matter in Committee, the Minister acknowledged that there was a problem, and agreed to do something about it. We have two choices. Our preferred route is to put something in the Bill, and to do it now. That is what amendment No. 10 would do. It is entirely in keeping with the other provisions in schedule 3. That would leave the matter beyond doubt. The alternative is to do what the Minister said that he would do in Committee—use one of the Secretary of State's order-making powers within the Bill to exempt the processing of data from political canvassing.

The problem that the House must ask the Minister to address tonight—it is a serious point—is whether any order-making power will be introduced after the Bill receives Royal Assent and while the transitional provisions that introduce the various clauses that give rise to the difficulty are in force. In other words, if we take the order-making power route, can we be certain that there will not be a period during which processing of data obtained from political canvassing will be illegal? It is a straight question that we ask the Minister. I think that I know what his preference is, but he understands that this is a serious problem. It would have been wrong of us not to draw the House's attention to the problem. It is all very well discussing a matter such as this in Committee, but, unless it is debated on the Floor of the House, colleagues might not be aware of how serious the problem is.

I ask the Minister, in all fairness, whether he can give us a categorical assurance that the provisions relating to sensitive data, such as political opinions, membership of trade unions, religious beliefs and so on, to the processing of which people must give explicit consent—clearly, we cannot take an answer to the question "How are you going to vote?" as explicit consent—will not come into force until the Government introduce an order to tackle that serious problem.

Mr. George Howarth: The hon. Gentleman raises an important subject. It is not a partisan issue, but one of which all of us in the House have an understanding and in which all of us have a vested interest. We have to get the process right if we are to be able to conduct our politics properly in future.

Article 8 of the directive requires member states to establish a special regime for the processing of what the directive defines as sensitive personal data, which includes information about an individual's political opinion. If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall not deal in any detail with the amendment, because he has referred to the approach that we undertook in Committee to adopt and it would be as well if I were to give him some idea of how we intend to proceed on that basis.

The Government's preferred option, as the hon. Gentleman rightly acknowledged, is to deal with the matter through subordinate legislation. Paragraph 10 of schedule 3 permits the Secretary of State to make an order specifying further circumstances in which sensitive personal data may be processed. When the matter was debated in Committee, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department explained that the Government intended to make an order under that provision that would allow the processing of political opinions data collected for canvassing purposes. I repeat that undertaking today.

As I said, the amendment is not a party political issue, but one which affects all Members of the House, and the Government expect to approach the matter on a cross-party basis when bringing forward the necessary order. In response to the hon. Gentleman's specific question, I cannot say when we shall be in a position to introduce the order; however, preliminary work has been started and we hope to make swift progress. I can assure him that the restrictions on the processing of sensitive data set by the Bill will not be brought into force until the order is ready. In view of that undertaking, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will feel comfortable in withdrawing his amendment.

Mr. Greenway: We should have liked a date, but the Minister has given me the assurance that I sought. The whole House will be gratified to learn that we can go trundling up and down the streets, canvassing our constituents. I suppose that I should ask the Minister whether what he promises will happen before the European elections, but I wonder how much canvassing will be done, given that no one will have a clue whom they are voting for—but that is another story. We are grateful to the Minister and, in that spirit, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Cohen: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 65, line 9, at end add—

'PART V

CHANGE TO THE DEFINITION OF RELEVANT FILING SYSTEM AFTER 23RD OCTOBER 2007.

20. The definition of relevant filing system in section 1(1) of this Act shall be modified so that the definition ends after the third occurrence of the word 'individuals'.

21. Paragraph 20 shall have effect after 23rd October 2007.'.

My amendment is about structured manual files, on which there was an important debate in the other place. Such files will not be subject to the new law, so the Bill will allow organisations such as the Economic League to flourish.

The problem relates entirely to the private sector; there will be no problem in the public sector, because the freedom of information legislation will provide access for every individual to manual files, barring personal data. The human rights legislation, too, will minimise the files and personal information held by public bodies if they invade privacy.

9.30 pm

In a briefing note on manual records dated 29 January, available on her website, the Data Protection Registrar said that if the Government's approach to structured manual records was

"the correct interpretation of the Directive, it is hard to see how it makes practical sense".

It seems that that advice has been ignored.

In another place, Lord Williams of Mostyn, the Under-Secretary, said about the relevant filing systems:

"We do not wish the definition to apply to miscellaneous collections of paper about individuals, even if the collections are assembled in a file with the individual's name . . . on the front".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 16 March 1998; Vol. 587, c. 467.]

There will therefore be a legal reason for some unscrupulous private sector bodies to evade all data protection control.

For example, a private sector organisation such as the Economic League, which kept dossiers on trade union members for the purposes of blacklisting them, will be allowed to keep whatever information it likes, however inaccurate or irrelevant it is, and to disclose it to whomever it likes, so long as it keeps the information on paper and in date order. Similarly, that aspect of the Bill is a godsend to private investigators, allowing them to indulge in covert surveillance of individuals, and will encourage the use of enforced subject access. They, too, will be able to evade all data protection controls.

The lack of data protection controls means that individuals will have no rights, and there will be unlimited disclosure to anybody of secret dossiers and files of irrelevant or inaccurate information, which may be kept for ever. In short, organisations such as the Economic League, and private investigators, will enjoy the same level of total exemption as MI5, MI6 and GCHQ. It is hard to believe that that is what Ministers really intend.

The Government have produced a convoluted definition of a relevant filing system, because they are worried about the costs to the private sector. My amendment is a compromise, telling the private sector that it has nine years to bring all personal files into the ambit of data protection controls. At least after that time, malicious or unfair use of personal data kept on manual files would cease.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for explaining the purpose of his amendment. I hope that I shall be able to reassure him about the specific examples that he has given. As hon. Members will be aware, the Data Protection Act 1984 does not apply to manual records; it is concerned only with the automated processing of personal data. However, the 1995 directive, to which the Bill gives effect, requires member states to apply their data protection laws to certain manual records. Article 2 of the directive attempts a definition of the manual records that it intends to cover. That definition is accompanied by a more detailed commentary in recitals 15 and 27.

The definition of a "relevant filing system" in clause 1(1) is based on those provisions of the directive. The Government's purpose has been to cover all the manual records that the directive requires member states to cover, but to go no further than the directive requires. The purpose of the directive is to bring within the scope of data protection law the manual records that lend themselves to easy manipulation of the information contained in them, as computerised records do.

The Government support that approach. The greatest risk of infringement of privacy comes from manual records held in such a way that specific information about particular individuals can be easily identified and extracted. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept that his example of a card index held, say, by the Economic League, would be covered by the Bill, because with each card there would be the possibility of identifying information about a particular individual. Such a system would be included under the Bill.

To that extent, I hope that my hon. Friend will be satisfied that the Government have had regard to his concerns. Where manual records are not structured in such a way as to permit the easy manipulation of specific information, the risk of infringement of privacy is much less. The directive does not require data protection law to be applied to such records; nor does the Bill.

My hon. Friend's amendment would extend the application of the Bill to such records; the Government do not believe that necessary or desirable. To do so would be to impose additional burdens on business and others who use manual records in circumstances in which there is little or no threat to privacy. It would put UK data controllers at a competitive disadvantage.

I agree that the amendment would not come into force until 23 October 2007, but deferring implementation does not necessarily remove the difficulties of substance that I have identified.

I must tell my hon. Friend that the Government cannot accept the amendment. I hope that, given my assurances, my hon. Friend will feel able to withdraw it.

Mr. Cohen: I accept the Minister's assurances and beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen's Consent and Prince of Wales's Consent signified.]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): Hear, hear.

9.36 pm

Mr. George Howarth: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health on the important role he has played in the passage of the Bill. His presence was not felt in Committee or on Second Reading, but between Report and Third Reading he made a significant contribution.

Mr. Greenway: Yes, but does he understand the Gaskin amendment?

Mr. Howarth: My right hon. Friend's stalwart work on the health service shows that he has the wisdom of Solomon—so I am sure that he does.

The House knows that the principal purpose of the Bill is to give effect to the 1995 EC data protection directive, which has the worthy aim of improving the single market by establishing a common standard of protection of the highest order for individuals. But it is not always an easy instrument to make sense of; the subject matter with which it deals is technical and complex—those who sat through the Committee can only assent to that.

The Government have always had in mind as a target date for implementation 24 October of this year—the date by which the directive requires member states to have implemented its provisions. If, as the Government hope, the Bill reaches the statute book before the summer recess, we shall have made good progress towards meeting that target.

The passage of the Bill is not the end of the matter, however. The Bill provides for a large amount of subordinate legislation. Some of its powers have been put in place at a fairly late stage of the Bill's progress through Parliament; many of them will need to be in place before the new data protection regime will work. We have made a start on that work at the same time as the Bill has been progressing through Parliament so as to minimise the interval between Royal Assent and commencement. Some progress has been made, but we are not as far forward as we would have wished. With just over three months to go to the due implementation date, a great deal of work on subordinate legislation still needs to be done.

The Government have a choice. We could rush forward in an attempt to meet the target date, which would mean no public consultation, even on important matters, and little or no opportunity for those affected to make the necessary changes to their systems.

Mr. Soley: During the consultation period, will it be made clear to the public that they can complain about inaccurate material that appears in the press; that they have a right to see those files, subject to the conditions in the Bill; and that the press has a duty to correct inaccurate information that it holds on people in its files? It is important not only that the public know that, but that editors and owners know it.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those comments. I can confirm that we debated the matter at length and that we attach great importance to the arrangements that have been drawn up. I know that my hon. Friend has a long and distinguished history of raising such concerns.

There is no guarantee that we would be able to meet the 24 October implementation deadline. The alternative approach, which the Government strongly prefer, is to proceed in a more considered way, carrying out public consultation, as appropriate, and allowing reasonable periods for those affected to prepare for the new regime. That means, of course, that the 24 October implementation date would no longer be a realistic target. Although that is regrettable, the Government believe that it is undesirable to rush through the next phase, at the risk of giving imperfect consideration to important matters, and possibly producing a defective regime.

We may miss the target by a short period, but, in the Government's view, it is more important that the Bill should be properly implemented. From information available to us, it seems that a number of European partners are unlikely to meet the 24 October target, and some major countries are likely to be well behind us.

I hope that there is as much understanding on that point as has been shown in all our debates on the substance of the Bill. On Second Reading the right hon. Member for North–West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) agreed with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the best way of taking forward the work of the Bill would be in a non-partisan manner. For the most part, that has been the central feature of the Bill. The Government welcome the positive and helpful spirit that representatives of all parties have contributed to our debates. I pay a particular compliment to the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who throughout has been constructive in his approach. That applies also to my hon. Friends.

I am sure that the detailed consideration and attention given to the Bill and the amendments that have been made mean that it is in good shape as it returns to the other place. I commend the Bill to the House.

9.42 pm

Mr. Greenway: I am grateful to the Minister for his remarks. The Bill takes the issue of data protection considerably further than the Data Protection Act 1984.

It is a complex Bill, but, as the hon. Gentleman said, we have dealt with it in a co-operative spirit, as the Second Reading debate promised.

I thank my hon. Friends the Members for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor), for Poole (Mr. Syms) and for Cheadle (Mr. Day) for their help and support in the Standing Committee, and my right hon. Friend the Member for North–West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney), who was a great source of help and encouragement to me in preparing for the Committee stage.

I shall now introduce a less co-operative note. It ought to be a matter of concern that, notwithstanding the complex nature of the legislation, both in Committee and on the Floor of the House tonight we have dealt with an extremely large number of amendments—well in excess of 200. This evening, we agreed no fewer than 74 amendments to the Bill, which has only 75 clauses.

The Minister says that a delay in implementation is likely. The Bill will give rise to a huge amount of subordinate legislation, which will undoubtedly have an even greater impact on organisations and individuals than some of the structural legislation that it contains. Given the choice of rushing to meet the implementation date set out in the Bill or doing it properly, I would have taken the same decision as the hon. Gentleman. I think that it should be done properly because this measure will have far-reaching implications for every commercial and voluntary organisation in this country. That is why it was so important to conduct detailed scrutiny of the Bill. I believe that that will be necessary also when the subordinate legislation comes forward. Time will tell whether everything works as intended and complies with the directive in every respect.

I have two more points. We have dealt with the first satisfactorily, but I still have concerns about the second. When the Bill came from the other place, two issues had caused the Lords concern. The first involved the then clause 28, now clause 29, and the exemption that we discussed earlier in relation to crime, taxation and Government Departments. The Government have dealt entirely adequately with the issue raised in another place when an important subsection was deleted, and we supported in Committee the inclusion of new clause 29(4).

The second issue of concern involved the then clause 31, which is now clause 32. That clause is unamended, so it will be difficult to amend it in another place. Notwithstanding that fact, we place on the record our lingering concern that the scheme in that clause, which deals with the important issue of journalistic, literary and artistic purposes and seeks to balance press freedom with individuals' freedom—the House debated that issue at some length during consideration of the Human Rights Bill—will not do what the Government expect it to. Time will tell who is right.

We had this debate in Standing Committee—I see the Minister nodding. When proceedings are stayed so that individuals may seek to obtain information, rectify inaccurate data or block processing and they come up against an organisation that claims exemption for journalistic, literary or artistic purposes, it is clear that proceedings will be stayed pending a determination by the commissioner and subsequently, on appeal, by the tribunal. However, the Bill does not say that publication will necessarily be allowed to continue. My impression is that that will happen in the majority of cases, and that is the spirit in which both sides have proceeded both in Committee and on the Floor of the House and during our earlier consideration of the Human Rights Bill.

I believe—this is very much a personal view—that, given the scope of the exemption in clause 32, some people may seek to abuse the provisions of that clause by claiming that they are processing data because they wish to publish something that they believe to be in the public interest. That will be true in the majority of cases, but some people will seek to abuse that position. That will prompt lawyers to challenge whether the legislation says that publication must be allowed to go ahead pending determination of the concern. At that point, the Government will need to sit up and think whether they have dealt with the problem as adequately as they think they have. We could have improved that provision by amending it, but we failed to persuade the Minister of the case for so doing. I have a feeling that we shall return to the issue, perhaps in several years, and it is on the record that I am not satisfied.

Apart from that, we have done a pretty good job of scrutinising the Bill, and I hope that those who take the trouble to read the report of our debates will find it helpful in understanding the Bill's provisions.

9.48 pm

Mr. Cohen: I have presented four data protection Bills to the House, and I congratulate the Government on presenting this Bill. However, I was not selected by the Whips to serve on the Standing Committee that considered the Bill because, obviously, there was great interest from other Labour Members.

The Government have made a worthy attempt to improve data protection and to implement the European directive, although they have not been altogether successful in some aspects. Recital 10 of the directive requires that

"'approximation' of the laws of the Member States 'must not result in any lessening of the protection they afford but must, on the contrary, seek to ensure a high level of protection in the Community'."

A lot of the Bill achieves that higher level of protection, but several aspects fail that test. The Government have been unduly influenced—and, I think, misinformed—about the possible costs of implementing data protection in relation to the directive. In her briefing note on the Bill, the Data Protection Registrar says, in respect of the £1,892 million estimated costs, that she "cannot see why data controllers should have to incur increases in compliance costs of this kind".

I think that a false figure has been put out.

Time is short and I do not want to delay the House, so I shall run through a few items to signal where I think that there may be problems and a lessening in rights. I have already referred to the relevant filing system. On enforced subject access, the Bill provides less protection than the Police Act 1997 in respect of employers obtaining criminal conviction certificates, and they will be able to see spent and unspent convictions, bindings over and cautions against would-be employees under enforced subject access, until it is got rid of.

On sensitive personal data, the Bill has worrying aspects. Genetic data should have been regarded as sensitive, and the confidentiality of medical records is a concern. Aspects of the Bill effectively allow for the increasing of data processing without the patient's consent, and some of those contradict what the General Medical Council recommends. I am concerned that protection for patients, especially that associated with their consent, is not going according to what the GMC advises. Ministers should give some thought to an explanation of why they have moved away from the GMC, at least in that respect.

The second data protection principle is weakened by being linked to a notification procedure. That was not required under the directive, and I do not know why the Government weakened that area, but I am concerned most about the exemptions. The scope of a number of exemptions has been widened, or new exemptions have been introduced. No explanation has been given, and there should have been an explanation if the current law had created any problems. It did not seem to be creating problems, so I do not know why those new exemptions have been introduced.

There are powers in the Bill for data controllers to delay the giving of information. That proposal will not be in the freedom of information Bill, but it will be in this Bill, and it will cost a lot of money.

The Data Protection Registrar has expressed concern about clause 59, which has been described as a "gagging clause", preventing staff from discussing cases of interest with the press. I have outlined some of the aspects of the Bill which I fear will result in a reduction in the rights of data subjects. I suspect that, in future, the European Commission may require the United Kingdom to modify the legislation to deal with some of the problems that I have mentioned.

NON-SITTING FRIDAYS

Ordered,

That the Order of 19th May 1997 relating to Non-sitting Fridays be amended by leaving out 'and 10th July'.—[Mr. Robert Ainsworth.]

Emergency Contraception

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert Ainsworth.]

9.55 pm

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): I should like to think of this Adjournment debate as my contribution to the 50th anniversary of the national health service.

Before I became a Member of Parliament, I was a family planning doctor and general practitioner for many years, and I saw hundreds of examples of young women who needed emergency contraception and could not obtain it. In many cases, that led to unwanted babies or abortions. The problem lies in the fact that appointments have to be made with GPs and it often takes two or three days before one can see them. Casualty departments are overcrowded and, in any case, are not appropriate places to discuss such matters. Moreover, there are fewer family planning clinics than there used to be, and women often have to wait until after the weekend before they can go to one. Thus, women often cannot get emergency contraception within the prescribed 72 hours unless they are very brave and persistent. Young teenagers, in particular, are terribly afraid of making a fuss.

I must state at the outset that I regret the fact that there is so much sexual activity among young teenagers. Many factors are to blame, as I am sure the Minister realises. The fact that unwanted pregnancies and abortion rates are highest in areas of social deprivation will not have escaped her notice, and I know that she is already addressing the problem of sex education by trying to improve matters in schools and to increase personal responsibility among young people. I commend her for those much-needed efforts.

Emergency contraception is not meant to be a substitute for either sex education or regular contraception. They must go hand in hand. However, it is a practical way in which to deal with the world as it is, and its wider use would prevent the high rate of abortion among young women, which must be our main priority. This country has the highest teenage pregnancy rate in Europe. Out of every 1,000 women under the age of 16, 8.5 get pregnant, and in the 16 to 19 age group, between 58 and 59 out of every 1,000 get pregnant. It simply will not do. Half to a third of those pregnancies end in abortion.

The problem is not limited to teenagers. Many older women who are otherwise quite responsible about their sexual lives and their relationships have contraceptive accidents and need better access to emergency contraception.

There are two forms of emergency contraception. The fitting of an intra-uterine contraceptive device, commonly known as a coil, must be done within five days. I do not intend to go into that this evening because the device must be fitted by a properly trained doctor in a clinic.

I want to concentrate on the emergency contraceptive pill. It is a dose of oestrogen and progesterone female sex hormones, which have been used since the 1950s. Indeed, in the 1960s, when I was on the pill, I took the equivalent dose of the emergency contraceptive pill every day—21 days out of 28—and so did many women of my generation.

Emergency contraception is a dose repeated once, after 12 hours, and it prevents pregnancy in about 90 per cent. of episodes. In most cases, its effect is to prevent the release of the egg from the ovary. It is important for people to know that. If it is taken later in the menstrual cycle, it will prevent implantation in the wall of the uterus of the fertilised egg. It has the same effect as a coil or an intra-uterine device. It is not an abortion in any shape or form. I repeat that point: emergency contraception cannot be used to cause an abortion.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Janet Anderson.]

Dr. Tonge: Emergency contraception cannot be used to cause an abortion. If a woman is already pregnant, emergency contraception does not work. Abortion occurs after implantation, and the emergency contraceptive pill intervenes before that stage.

Recently, the Daily Mail ran an article claiming that I and my supporters were promoting abortion over the counter. The journalist who wrote that article should be thoroughly ashamed. We are trying to prevent unwanted pregnancies and abortions. Such misleading, inaccurate and unbalanced reporting will harm the very people who need most help. The press are ready to condemn single parents and unmarried mothers, and when people try to do something about the problem, they condemn them, too. Over the years, the press has been responsible for pill scares, which have caused many unwanted pregnancies and abortions. They have put women off taking the birth control pill, and now they are trying to put them off emergency contraception.

I shall deal with some of the issues. The fear of thrombosis is often mentioned. Sixty in 100,000 women who become pregnant will get a deep-vein thrombosis. It is a little-known fact that pregnancy is quite a dangerous condition. In my pill-taking days, when women were taking the higher dose of pill, the rate of thrombosis was 30 in 100,000. With the new pills used today, the risk is even lower: 15 to 30 in 100,000. In the past 10 years, with the use of the emergency contraceptive pill, there have been very few cases of thrombosis. The levels are similar to those of the general population who are neither pregnant nor taking the pill: about 5 in 100,000. It is not a risk.

A one-off high dose of oestrogen and progesterone carries no contra-indications, except if there is an active attack of migraine—anyone knows when that is happening. That is caused by dilation of the cerebral arteries and may be affected by oestrogen.

Suspected pregnancy is a contra-indication simply because the method does not work after implantation of the fertilised egg. As I said, it will not cause an abortion. Experience in the past 40 years has shown that the use of the ordinary contraceptive pill does not have any adverse effects on a baby, even if the mother continues to take the pill while she is pregnant.

A large dose of the same hormone—such as a young woman taking it two or three times in one month—would disrupt the menstrual cycle, but would not have any other effect. Indeed, if a baby swallows a whole packet of contraceptive pills—four or five times the dose of the emergency contraception—the mother is told that it may make her baby very sick, but that, apart from dealing with that, she need take no action.

The emergency contraceptive pill is safer than aspirin, paracetamol, many of the caffeine products that are available as pep pills and many drugs that are currently on sale in supermarkets and petrol stations. Indeed, one can buy contraception in the form of condoms at petrol stations, but, if a condom breaks or the method goes wrong, one cannot get a remedy anywhere in the time scale about which I am talking. I know that this is controversial, but I believe that emergency contraception available over the counter from properly trained pharmacists could prevent an abuse of the method.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon): In this country, we spend much time and money in training pharmacists, only to lock them away in the back of chemists' shops. Does my hon. Friend agree that advice on emergency contraception is an example of how we could use the professionalism and expertise of pharmacists—properly remunerated, I should add—to take the load off national health service clinics and casualty departments, as she suggests?

Dr. Tonge: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention, with which I whole-heartedly agree. Pharmacists often know much more than many general practitioners about drugs and their interactions. Indeed, I have often seen pharmacists save a difficult situation by correcting a prescription. So, yes, I would welcome greater use of pharmacists.

If the emergency contraceptive pill were made available over the counter, women would have to pay for it, which I believe would, in some cases, be a positive factor. Teenagers, particularly young teenagers, would be reluctant to pay for the pills again when they found out that they could get them free from a clinic, nurse or GP. That would have the added advantage of ensuring that very young people would, on the subsequent times that they needed this method, receive adequate counselling about their sexual behaviour, contraceptive needs and sexual health, which is what we all want. However, I appreciate that that may not be possible immediately.

A pilot scheme operating in Washington state allows for emergency contraception to be available on prescription. Under a protocol agreed by local doctors, local nurses and pharmacists may dispense the emergency contraceptive pill—they are, of course, trained to ask the right questions. The scheme has recently received the blessing of the only company in the United Kingdom that currently makes a packaged form of emergency contraception—Schering Pharmaceuticals—so there would be no difficulty in making emergency contraception available, especially in the light of the Crown review of the prescription, supply and administration of medicines.

The proposals that I have outlined would not make young women more vulnerable. Young women are most vulnerable when they have no one to turn to. They become scared and then they do nothing—they become yet another unwanted pregnancy or abortion statistic. If emergency contraception were made more widely available from nurses and pharmacists under a protocol, young women would have people to turn to at very short notice.

The Minister is committed to reducing the number of teenage pregnancies. I believe that my proposals, combined with her commendable efforts on sex education for young people, would go a long way towards that commitment. I apologise for this list, but my colleagues in the House and in the medical profession, and I are backed by the British Medical Association, the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, the Royal College of Nursing, the Royal Pharmaceutical Society, the Family Planning Association—to which I owe a great debt, as it trained me in this field and it was one of the original organisations to promote family planning—and especially the Birth Control Trust, which I thank very much for its work on this matter. We all want to know how the Government intend to proceed.

10.8 pm

The Minister for Public Health (Ms Tessa Jowell): I thank the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) for raising this important issue. I pay tribute to her, and to other hon. Members who have worked so hard—particularly in recent weeks—to focus public attention on it. The question of ease of access to emergency contraception is an essential part of broader family planning provision.

The hon. Lady made very clear the case for accessible emergency contraception. Emergency contraception is precisely that: contraception to be used in an emergency, possibly when the regular form of contraception fails. As the hon. Lady rightly said, without it many women may live in fear of an unwanted pregnancy, and may be forced into seeking an abortion. Abortion is, of course, a last resort, but too many women in Britain today resort to it because contraception has failed. In 1997, 170,000 abortions were carried out, the majority for women in their 20s.

Let us look briefly at the facts about emergency contraception. It is provided free as part of national health service comprehensive family planning services. Although we are talking about a pill on this occasion, it is important to remember—as the hon. Lady pointed out—that emergency contraception is available in two forms, the copper intra-uterine device and hormonal emergency contraception.

Hormonal emergency contraception, on which I want to concentrate, was first licensed in the United Kingdom in 1984. It is effective for up to 72 hours after unprotected sex—a fact which I still do not think is lodged sufficiently in the minds of many women, especially young women. It prevents a fertilised egg from being implanted in the uterus, or, alternatively, suppresses ovulation. As the hon. Lady said, it is very effective: more than 95 per cent. of women who take emergency contraceptive pills do not become pregnant. However, it is intended to be used only occasionally, and is not a form of long-term birth control. As the hon. Lady said—I want to underline this—neither is it a form of abortion.

From the data that we have on prescription items, we know that more emergency contraception is being used. As I said in a parliamentary written answer to the hon. Lady, the number of prescription items increased from just under 400,000 in 1992–93 to well over 700,000 in 1996–97.

Emergency contraception is safe and effective, with few contra-indications. Safety and correct use will remain paramount, whatever changes are made in the future to ease accessibility. A study published today suggests that making emergency contraception more easily obtainable does no harm, that women are not more likely to use emergency contraception repeatedly and that the rate of unwanted pregnancies may be reduced.

The hon. Lady is interested in exploring further whether hormonal emergency contraception might be made more widely available through different routes. I think that we can do much more both to increase information for women and to improve access through existing services.

The current position is that emergency contraception is classified as a prescription-only medicine under both European Community and United Kingdom law. Medicines are so classified if they are likely to present a danger, either directly or indirectly, even when used correctly, if taken without medical supervision; or if they are frequently used incorrectly and, as a result, are likely to present a direct or indirect danger to human health.

Dr. Tonge: Does not the Minister accept, having listened to the experts and to what I said tonight, that the emergency contraceptive pill does not fit into either of those categories?

Ms Jowell: Those are the terms on which the emergency contraceptive pill is currently licensed. That judgment is made by the licensing authority. There is a well-established process for changing the legal classification from prescription-only to pharmacy availability.

The first stage is that the holder of the marketing authorisation, being satisfied of safety in use, proposes the change. My understanding is that only one company is licensed to produce the emergency contraceptive to which the hon. Lady referred. The proposal can come from other sources, and has on occasion come from professional bodies.

It is important to stress that third parties, whoever they may be, must still have detailed information on safety in use, and the manufacturer must be involved in producing patient information for medicine use in the absence of medical supervision.

The second hurdle is the assessment of the safety of a change in classification, which involves the assessment of available scientific and epidemiological evidence by the Medicines Control Agency; careful consideration of the medicine's risks and benefits; rigorous evaluation of the evidence on safety in use; and an evaluation of the direct danger of the medicine based on an assessment of the seriousness, severity or frequency of adverse reactions.

There is also an evaluation of any indirect danger to health; for example, wider public health issues, such as a possible increase in sexually transmitted diseases if increased use of the emergency pill leads to decreased reliance on barrier methods, must be considered.

The third stage is for the Committee on Safety of Medicines to consider every application for deregulation from prescription-only status to pharmacy availability. The committee examines again the evidence of safety in use in relation to criteria for prescription-only status and advises on the product's risks and benefits in the context of its proposed over-the-counter availability.

The penultimate stage is public consultation. If the committee is satisfied that the risks and benefits are acceptable, on the basis of the available evidence, a period of public consultation follows. Consultation makes possible a wider debate on the social, ethical and moral aspects, as well as the scientific and broader public health issues. The responses are then considered by the Medicines Commission. Only after those four stages have been completed does the Medicines Commission advise Ministers on the proposal to amend the prescription-only medicines order. Ministers then make a decision. Emergency contraception is no exception to that process.

Another route, to which the hon. Lady alluded, is the supply and administration of medicines under group protocols. As she knows, the Crown review into the prescribing, supply and administration of medicines has been considering related issues. The full review is drawing towards a conclusion, and Ministers expect its second report in the summer. The first report, setting out recommendations for the supply and administration of medicines under group protocols, was published towards the end of April, and recommended that the majority of patients should continue to receive medicines on an individual basis, but that group protocols should be used in certain limited situations.

The provision of contraception as part of a comprehensive family planning service could be one such area. Highly qualified nurses are working in family planning, and some of them are currently working effectively under group protocols. I believe that the first report of the Crown review forms a solid basis for setting standards to develop good practice in that area of care. We wish to consider the implications carefully before consulting further on detailed proposals, and we hope to undertake consultation in the next few weeks.

The hon. Lady referred to the scheme being conducted in Washington state in the north-west of the United States of America. Pharmacists are participating in a pilot study in which a collaborative agreement between pharmacists and a prescribing clinician enables the pharmacists to provide the emergency contraceptive pill directly to women according to an agreed protocol. That is a new project in its early days of piloting, and I understand that it will be subject to proper evaluation. We certainly want to consider carefully the implications for the United Kingdom of that type of experiment.

I want to deal with some of the broader aspects. What I have said will make it clear to the hon. Lady that the immediate change is not in prospect. It is essential, however, to consider how we can make emergency contraception more accessible to women who need it. As the hon. Lady said, for the emergency contraceptive pill to be effective, it must be readily accessible within the 72-hour window of opportunity. It can be prescribed by any general practitioner who provides contraceptive services, and it is available at any family planning clinic, most genito-urinary medicine or sexual health clinics and some accident and emergency departments. Young people can also go to young person's clinics or Brook advisory centres. It is not acceptable for women to have difficulty making appointments with their GPs, to find family planning clinics closed or to be turned away from accident and emergency departments. Health authorities should ensure that that does not happen.

No matter how accessible the contraception is, the other side of the coin is information. People must be aware of what emergency contraception offers. Women need timely information about the accessibility of emergency contraception, and about how it works and when it should be taken. Raising awareness has been a key Government priority. The Department of Health recently funded an awareness-raising campaign by the Health Education Authority, which stressed that the emergency contraceptive pill can be taken up to 72 hours after unprotected sex, and that the other form of emergency contraception—the copper intra-uterine device—can be inserted after up to five days. I am heartened by much of the media coverage that has sought to dispel the myth of the morning-after pill. The hon. Lady referred to what she considered to be irresponsible reporting, but we need to recognise that the media can be important allies for us, particularly in getting the message across to vulnerable young women.

Just lately, some responsible reports referred to the 72-hour time interval, which remains insufficiently understood. More broadly, it is important to get across to as many women as possible further information about exactly how emergency contraception works.

The contraceptive education service run by the Family Planning Association, with Department of Health funding, has published a detailed leaflet for women and their partners on both forms of emergency contraception. As part of contraceptive awareness week, it has launched an information pack on emergency contraception for health promotion units. The service provides answers to questions from women and their partners across a wide range of contraceptive issues, including emergency contraception, and the CES helpline provides information on the location of family planning clinics.

In summary, therefore, whether or not we move in time to a greater accessibility by increasing the places from which women can obtain the emergency contraceptive pill, certain principles will continue to apply. First, safety and correct use will remain paramount. Secondly, women and their partners have the right to a confidentially provided service, and ways will need to be found to ensure that that is honoured, if the pattern of access changes. They also have the right to detailed advice and support in making decisions on their long-term contraception plans, so appropriate mechanisms for referral to a family planning doctor or nurse will need to be firmly in place. Information and accessibility are two key elements which we need to apply to making contraceptive advice more widely available.

The hon. Lady rightly referred to the Government's work on reducing teenage pregnancies. She will know better than most hon. Members that that is a highly complex issue, which cannot rely on one single remedy. It is important that the provision of contraception for young women who she, I and other hon. Members would agree have become sexually active before their time must be in the context of advice, support and counselling.

Dr. Tonge: Does the Minister agree that that young, vulnerable group of women are reluctant to seek help because they have to go to a GP in whom they may not have confidence, because he is known in the area, or to a local casualty department or a local family planning clinic, where they may be known and told off or castigated for what they have done?

Ms Jowell: In many cases, that is so, particularly where young women live in small communities. They are concerned that if they go to the doctor, they may be spotted by their auntie or another member of their family in the waiting room. That is a deterrent. Although we recognise that many GPs handle the issue with great sensitivity and care, we need to reflect carefully on the particular needs of young women, in providing not just advice on contraception and sex but the opportunity to talk about sex and contraception in the context of relationships. Later this year, we shall introduce specific proposals for reducing teenage pregnancy, of which these proposals will form part.

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Child Support Agency

9.34 am

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): Madam Speaker, may I raise a point of order on a matter which is causing grave concern and anger to the Opposition, and which, I suspect, in the light of previous statements you have made, will cause you considerable frustration? It is a matter of abuse of the House by the House not being told first of important changes in Government policy.

It is a well-known fact that the Government are hoping on Monday next week to make a statement to the House on changes to the Child Support Agency. It is also now a well-known fact that yesterday there was systematic briefing of journalists of what the Government proposed to say in their statement. That briefing has been reflected in this morning's newspapers, in all broadsheets, typified by the front page of The Guardian. Furthermore, there was some briefing of Sunday newspapers yesterday. There will be further briefings today of Sunday newspapers, and on Sunday, in the morning, the Secretary of State for Social Security will be taking part in a television programme, during which she will further be outlining the proposed changes to the CSA.

The House will not hear these changes until 3.30 pm on Monday at the earliest. You have often said, Madam Speaker, that you deprecate the House of Commons not being told of this sort of thing first. May I ask you what can be done to ensure that the House is not abused in this way, and that it is told first?

Furthermore, in the light of a number of statements that you have made, what can be done to stop the frustrating situation in which you voice deeply held views yet no one seems to take a blind bit of notice of what you are saying?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. As you know, the Child Support Agency, ever since it was introduced in 1992 by the Tory Government—[Interruption.]—with all-party support, has been found wanting over long periods.

I reckon that thousands of parliamentary questions have been tabled about the agency. I voted to scrap it several years ago. However, many of us have been involved in a campaign to get rid of it. I have been taking part in that consultation. I have raised the matter within the parliamentary Labour party. I have raised it at every opportunity. I have raised the matter inside the House and outside. I have made representations even to somebody in the House of Lords, which is a big step for me, to get rid of the CSA.

I find it fanciful that we cannot finish up with something in the newspapers when a gang of Labour Members, and perhaps some Opposition Members, are anxious to get rid of the agency. I am looking forward to the statement on Monday. I hope that some of the briefings and leakings are not as they have been put forward. I hope that the statement will be even better than what we have heard so far. I am waiting to be surprised on Monday.

Madam Speaker: No doubt there is considerable press speculation on an issue such as this, where there has been much public debate over a number of months. Nevertheless, if there has been direct leaking and briefing of policy changes, I deprecate it most strongly. The House is fully aware of my firm views on this matter.

I am most anxious that, if there is any new policy or any change of policy, properly elected Members of this place are told first before any section of the media. I cannot deprecate strongly enough the leaks and the briefings that go on, perhaps behind our backs, in such matters. I have taken all steps possible through all the channels available to me, and I shall continue to do so, to ensure that all such policy matters come before the House before any section of the media.

Clause 10

TRAINING COURSES

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 6, line 6, after ("State",) insert—

("() authorise the making by the Secretary of State of provision about the charging of fees for the grant or variation of licences,")

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mrs. Gilroy.]

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 4.

9.39 am

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): I hope that I may be allowed to make a few comments—after all, there has been little debate. The Bill received its Second Reading without debate, and it spent only one hour in Committee. When the Bill reached the House of Lords, considerable concern was expressed about its wide-ranging regulatory powers and Henry VIII clauses. One only has to make a cursory reading of the Bill to see that the Secretary of State may, by regulation, do whatever he pleases to regulate the fireworks industry. That is a worrying development.

The Bill should not be a private Member's Bill—it should be a Government Bill. The amendments go to the heart of the Bill, as they deal with the Secretary of State being given more powers to regulate closely the amount of fees to be set for training purposes. I take a great interest in fireworks, because, for a time, I was the Minister responsible for the fireworks industry. I believe that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth)—who is sitting in front of me—is also a former Consumer Affairs Minister, and I think that he too was responsible for the fireworks industry.

When I had that responsibility, there was continual pressure for more regulation. I am now getting very concerned about the matter. It can be said, on any matter, that the industry should not be allowed to set its own fees for training purposes. One could argue that about any industry. One could argue that, as we are talking about the fireworks industry and are dealing with potentially dangerous substances, the Secretary of State should be given wide-ranging powers.

My hon. Friends should look at the amendment closely. It will be said that the private sector is allowed to set the fees, it could start charging exorbitant fees for training, or it could provide slipshod training, and therefore the Secretary of State must be involved. That argument could be used about any training course in any industry. I am not sure that that, of itself, is a strong argument. I hope that the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy), or the Minister when he replies to this debate, will deal with that point.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): My hon. Friend is making an important point about training. Will he reconcile the Government's attitude to this matter with their publicly stated commitment to the principle of training and enterprise councils, which holds that employers should regulate training since they best understand the industrial needs in their sector of the economy?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The hon. Gentleman's intervention is wide of the Lords amendment.

Mr. Leigh: I will not respond to that point, except to say that what is pertinent to the Lords amendments is whether the industry itself—which is best equipped to know the circumstances in which it operates—should set the level of fees for training or whether it should be the Secretary of State. It should worry my hon. Friends that this is another instance in which the Secretary of State will set the level of fees.

It could equally be said that, if the matter were left to the industry, it could subsidise training to all and sundry. It could expand the market for the most extravagant products and could thereby distort the market. That argument will be used by those in favour of the amendments. I do not believe that the amendments are necessary. They make a bad and dangerous Bill even worse, and even more regulatory. It grieves me, having spent so many years being concerned with the DTI and deregulation, to see another instance of even more regulation being provided.

The prejudices that people use against the private sector setting fees are unsustainable. There is possibly a danger of abuse if the Secretary of State is given wide-ranging powers. If the Secretary of State is too involved in the process, private enterprise may be gradually prevented from setting its own high-quality training courses and its own fees.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Given my hon. Friend's experience in the DTI and of this sector, has he begun to consider the manpower and bureaucracy that is likely to be involved not only in the licensing process—the Bill refers to "licensed persons"—but in the Secretary of State getting involved in "the charging of fees for the grant or variation of licenses"?

Does that not give my hon. Friend pause for thought, given his experience?

Mr. Leigh: I agree with my right hon. Friend, and he and I have practical experience. It is some years since my right hon. Friend and I dealt with matters in the DTI. I pay tribute to the expertise of the officials who work in the Department. I recognise that they are not unduly bureaucratic, and that they have the public interest at heart. I make no criticism of them at all. However, I wonder whether they have the necessary expertise to understand what is going on in all aspects of a complex industry.

For the life of me, I cannot understand why the Government have accepted the amendments. I do not know where they came from—presumably the Minister can elucidate. I cannot understand why the Government appear to have so little confidence in the ability of the industry to regulate itself.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): Further to the intervention by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), do we have any indication of how much the new structure will cost? It is not a cost-free exercise to give the Secretary of State those powers. There is no doubt that the money spent on that form of bureaucracy could be spent, for example, on assisting the national health service to give due regard to cancer screening—a matter which is currently exercising the NHS.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must not go wide of the amendments.

Mr. Leigh: I am not sure whether my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) has followed the debate on fireworks, but there has been a sustained attack on the fireworks industry for many years. It is all about taking away people's traditional enjoyment of their own private fireworks parties.

The Bill is part of a wider agenda, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst and I fought vigorously. That agenda is the imposition of more and more regulation and cost on the fireworks industry to make it more difficult for ordinary people to buy fireworks and enjoy them in their back gardens—something which, I am sure, my hon. Friends and I enjoyed when we were young. The Bill is part of a wider agenda to ensure that we have only a small number of highly regulated displays, run by professionals who have been forced to undergo expensive training courses, with fees, presumably, set by the Secretary of State. That is part of the wider agenda.

Mrs. Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton): Will the hon. Gentleman say what discussions he has had with the industry, particularly on its concerns about fees?

Mr. Leigh: I have not had any recent discussions with the industry on the matter, but I have been provided with a briefing note about its concerns. It is perfectly justifiable for Members of Parliament to speak from briefing notes. People in the industry are concerned, and I am dealing with their worries.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): The industry supports the Bill—it is not asking to set the fees—so who has provided him with the briefing note?

Mr. Leigh: What I will say—

Hon. Members: Tell the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is responsible for his own speech; who provides information is not a matter for the House.

Mr. Leigh: As someone who has taken an interest in the fireworks industry over the years, I am perfectly entitled to speak to these matters. If hon. Members do not find my comments interesting, they might listen to Mr. Mason, a director of consumer safety and standards, who told the Select Committee on Delegated Powers and Deregulation:

"I think that I would prefer to see the private sector solution if we can generate enough interest . . . If there were a fee payable, I think the same comments that I have made about publicly set fees would apply. We would expect them to cover costs in line with Treasury guidance, but no more. Underneath that, there are the course fees that these licensed persons charge the general public to attend the courses. Our normal expectation there I think is that we rely on competition to drive down course fees to the appropriate level. We are talking really of either commercial or voluntary organisations operating in a competitive market. That is not to say, however, that we might not find ourselves in a position where there were very few organisations offering training and that there was concern about an exploitation of what is after all a form of statutory monopoly. We are assuming that certain people can only have access to fireworks after they have gone through this procedure. We would certainly want the ability, under those circumstances, to fix a maximum level of fee, though again it would probably be a maximum rather than an absolute level because, even under those circumstances, you would hope that competition could drive down the prices further."

Mr. Mason made a serious case—that the private sector should be able to set the fees—although I wonder whether he was right to say that it was desirable to set a maximum fee. The problem with maximum fees is that they quickly become the going rate. If the usual forces of competition apply, there is no reason why a sensible fee should not be set. I am not sure why it is necessary for the Secretary of State to set a fee, let alone a maximum fee.

Mrs. Gilroy: The significance of the training scheme is that it would confer a statutory right to buy specific dangerous fireworks. Surely it must be right to limit the charges on what is, in effect, a right to buy particular fireworks.

Mr. Leigh: One could use that argument about any regulated industry and say that the Secretary of State should always be able to intervene. I am not sure why it should be assumed that, if the private sector set fees, it would drift into collusion. People in the industry are responsible; they are perfectly capable of setting fees to cover their costs and to allow others to enter the market. I hope that the Minister will explain why he thinks that he should become involved.

Bodies hoping to offer fireworks training will presumably be able to negotiate with the Government about obtaining permission, and come to some formal or informal understanding about the nature of the training, the length of the courses and the appropriate fees. Presumably the Secretary of State has other powers closely to regulate those matters and to ensure that people in the industry are not abusing their position of trust. I do not understand why it is thought that the Secretary of State does not already have sufficient powers to ensure proper compliance.

There is concern that the Secretary of State will set too high a fee. I am sure that she would not set out to do so, and that she would want to act entirely fairly. I do not suppose that she will be driven by revenue considerations, as the amount of money that the Treasury received from the fees would be small. I am more worried that safety campaigners will press for higher fees to limit the number of training courses and make it more difficult for people to provide them.

That has happened in other sectors. For example, people who are concerned about firearms use regulations to press the Secretary of State to erect ever higher barriers—a sin tax, so to speak—to prevent people from entering the market. I believe that the Secretary of State will be under continual political pressure from the well-organised group that is suspicious of fireworks to increase the fees prohibitively.

[Mr. Leigh]

Some may think that that would result in greater safety, but it could result in less safety. If fees are too high, fireworks organisers may be encouraged to cut corners and train fewer people. There are worrying precedents, especially in relation to firearms, of what happens when the Secretary of State becomes involved.

Anyone who has taken an interest in consumer affairs over the years will know of the increasing involvement of trading standards officers and the growth of regulation and Government interference. If the Secretary of State is too closely involved, local authority trading standards officers will also be involved. That would create a vicious circle of a drive for high fees and a reduction in the number of courses.

Mr. Forth: As we have not been given the pleasure and privilege of an explanation of the amendment, we must interpret it ourselves. Does my hon. Friend agree that the amendment suggests two sets of fees, one for those who train and the other for those who are trained? The regime will have a multiplicity of licences and fees, so the dangers that he highlights will be manifold.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Be brief.

Mr. Leigh: Neither the Bill nor the amendment tell us exactly how the training courses will be organised, who will take part or what the fees on industry will be. All we have is broad regulation-making powers being conferred on the Secretary of State, as is the case throughout the Bill. We are discussing a serious matter, as presumably the amendment would seriously curtail who the industry can train, how much it can charge and where training courses will be held. The Minister may wish to reassure us on that point, and to claim that that will not happen, but the history of fireworks legislation and of the House's interest in it demonstrates that that fear needs to be raised here, and that he needs to deal with it.

The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Nigel Griffiths): We will come to the history of fireworks—it is the hon. Gentleman's history, too.

Mr. Leigh: The Minister says that it is my history, but I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) and I have nothing to fear or hide about what we did on those matters. Throughout the period of Conservative government, we achieved for the industry a gradual improvement in public safety and awareness about fireworks. Certainly my right hon. Friend and I were responsible for expensive advertising campaigns.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not go into a wide general debate. He must speak to the amendments.

Mr. Leigh: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was led astray by the Minister, who was making a political point and diverting me from my interest in the narrow amendments.

The public sector might provide unfair competition for private sector training providers. I do not know whether the Minister will deny that that will happen. Presumably a local authority could offer a course in a given area, and so would become a training provider, in competition with the private sector. I do not know whether, under the amendment, the Secretary of State will be able to prevent unfair competition.

For the life of me I cannot understand—perhaps I have overlooked some matters—why it is necessary for the Secretary of State to become so closely involved. Is it because she does not trust the firework industry, or because there is a history of people acting in collusion? I do not know. I should have thought that the firework manufacturers would be the training providers. I cannot imagine anyone from outside the industry providing training.

Mr. Rowe: There seems to be a real possibility that the training may become a candidate for a national vocational qualification course. As the provision of NVQ courses is often the responsibility of training and enterprise councils, my hon. Friend's hope that training will remain primarily in the hands of the industry seems rather far of the mark.

Mr. Leigh: That may well be the case. It is difficult to speculate on what will happen, as there has been no debate on those matters in this House, and only sparse debate in the other place, which is why the debates this morning are important.

The counter-argument to mine is that, as only the manufacturer will provide the training because he will have the ranges and storage facilities in place, he could use his market power to dominate training, and presumably could thereby drive other people from the market; or manufacturers could use training as a loss leader. The argument might go—perhaps we will hear more about that—that they will use their profits from other sectors of the industry to subsidise their training courses. If that were true, and it resulted in training costs being forced down, I am not sure that we should necessarily worry too much about it.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): My hon. Friend has just said that, if training were provided by manufacturers, the cost could be covered by other sectors of their business. Many fireworks companies are also involved in defence contracts, which generate considerable revenue from the sale of pyrotechnics to the armed forces. All the evidence is that the strategic defence review, which we might see next week, will fall heavily on the procurement sector, so the defence-related part of the firework industry's business may become much smaller, and the revenue will not be there. The industry is going to be in for a tough time in the next few years and the Bill will do nothing but impose extra financial burdens on it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Bringing the defence industry into the matter would be going far too wide of the amendments.

Mr. Leigh: Of course I do not want to get involved in the problems of the defence industry, Mr. Deputy Speaker—there are other forums for doing so—but I think that we can debate what the amendments will mean to the fireworks industry and those companies that are owned by defence companies, and whether the argument that we are dealing with powerful companies, which will drive their competitors out of the market, is valid. I am not sure that that is entirely true, for the reasons given by my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin). I do not think that it will happen. I do not think that a few companies will use their market power to subsidise training courses and drive competitors out.

One could say that the companies would use their power only to give training on their own products, with minimum training on those of competitors. However, one could argue that about any industry. I accept that, with fireworks, we are dealing with potentially dangerous products, but if we go down that route, where will it end? Of what other industry will it be said that, because we are dealing with a potentially dangerous product, the Secretary of State must get involved, insist on training courses, regulate them, and set the level of fees?

Mr. Rowe: As my hon. Friend may know, in the past four years, four people have been killed by fireworks, but, on average, five people are killed every year playing ball games. Are we to have a set of regulations, at great expense, dominating—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must get back to the amendments, which are about fees and training facilities.

Mr. Leigh: My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent does the House a service by reminding us that, because of the gradual increase in safety awareness, for which the previous Government were responsible and which they promoted for many years, there has been a huge decline in the number of deaths compared with 20 or 30 years ago, and that great progress has been made—although, of course, any such death is very sad.

I do not know why the Government felt it necessary to use the private Member's Bill system to introduce the legislation, and why they are using the Lords amendments to make it even more draconian. My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent mentioned ball games, but one could talk about car manufacturers or the motor industry, which is a far more serious problem—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should not move on to car manufacturers. He must confine himself to the amendments.

Mr. Leigh: I was merely trying to point out that the fact that there have been deaths and that one is dealing with potentially dangerous products—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When the hon. Gentleman talks about deaths or any of those other matters, he is going into the generalities of the Bill. The amendments are specific, as I have already said, and mention fees and training courses. He must confine his remarks to the amendments.

Mr. Leigh: The fireworks industry is complex and experienced. Over the years, it has run training courses to ensure a gradual increase in competence in the use of fireworks and in safety awareness. It is perfectly entitled to set its own fees and to conduct training courses as it wishes, or with a light regulatory tough. The Secretary of State has not made out the case for setting fees.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): When my hon. Friend was a Minister at the Department of Trade and Industry, did his civil servants consider state-run or privately funded training schemes?

Mr. Leigh: My recollection is that that was not considered.

Mr. Forth: My recollection is that we were very reluctant to resort to elaborate licensing schemes and byzantine arrangements such as those in the Bill, because we judged that that would be disadvantageous in principle, and could harm the very people we were trying to protect, and indeed employment prospects in the industry and beyond. We always had employment at the forefront of our minds.

Mr. Leigh: We were under widespread pressure from safety campaigners to try to limit the ability of people to hold fireworks parties, but we never considered imposing such draconian regulations on the industry, as that was against our philosophy.

Mr. Colvin: My hon. Friend has spoken of training courses being regulated by central Government or by the industry, but he has left out the third option, which is local government. There is a case for local authorities assuming the responsibility for running courses and setting fees. Has he made any assessment of the costs that might be imposed on local authorities, which are probably in the best position, geographically, to do the work?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Be brief.

Mr. Colvin: How would local authority involvement impinge on the provisions in the Bill?

Mr. Leigh: I do not believe that local authorities should become more involved, because central Government already imposes many obligations on them, and because they would operate through trading standards officers. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst and I, in our previous incarnation, had constant run-ins with such officers, who have constantly imposed more and more onerous burdens on industry. A more local structure is not necessarily more benign. The correct route to take is by way of the private industry, which knows its own business best.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend agree that the ingenious suggestion of our hon. Friend the Member for Romsey (Mr. Colvin) runs into two difficulties: the diversity of regimes that would emerge, which would lead to inconsistencies, and the potential—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I was a bit too relaxed in allowing the question of local authorities to come into the debate. We should not go into detail on what local authorities can or cannot do in the matter. We must keep to the amendments, which concern the powers of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Leigh: The subject is in the clause, but of course I accept your strictures, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

[Mr. Leigh]

I do not know why it is necessary for the Secretary of State to be involved in setting fees. The industry is highly competitive, and there is no reason why it should not be left to its own devices to ensure that good training courses are available throughout the country to teach people how to use fireworks safely, or why the people who provide those courses should not be able to set appropriate fees.

What can possibly be gained by the Secretary of State setting fees? If they are set too high, people may be deterred from taking part in the courses, and if they are set too low, the courses may not be sustainable or properly run. The Secretary of State runs a Department with a budget of only about £1 billion.

Mr. Forth: Only?

Mr. Leigh: It is small in comparison with the budget of, say, the Department of Social Security. The Secretary of State does not have the time or the resources to know what the fees should be.

The Bill is highly regulatory. It should be a Government Bill, not a private Member's Bill. The Government have introduced it to regulate an industry that has provided innocent enjoyment for millions of people for many years.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): Is the hon. Gentleman speaking merely for our edification and enlightenment, or does he intend to oppose the Bill?

Mr. Leigh: It is difficult for me to answer that point and remain in order. I am unhappy about the Bill. I do not believe that it has been properly debated. It is highly regulatory, and I would be happier if it had not been introduced. It is, however, possible that the Minister can reassure us, and tell us that it is necessary and will save lives.

It is difficult to oppose in principle a Bill that the Minister will tell us will save lives. Any life lost, and especially a child's, should worry us. I am concerned about whether the Bill will in fact save lives, or whether, by imposing more and more onerous obligations on the industry, it will encourage people to cut corners. It often happens that, if one takes away people's right to run an industry in their own way, there comes a point at which the rules and regulations become unsustainable, and the industry tries to get a round them.

We have achieved a huge amount in the industry by way of consent, moving step by step every year and encouraging public awareness, but the Bill represents a step change. Before we make the amendments, we should have a proper debate and consider whether they will save any lives at all. If they will simply impose more rules and regulations on a highly regulated industry, we should reject them.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): It may be helpful if I rise early to outline the Opposition's attitude to the Bill. First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mrs. Gilroy). I can testify that it is an anxious business to pilot a private Member's Bill through the House. I imagine that she feels as anxious as ever today. It is an achievement to have got so far, and I wish her well.

The amendments raise the subject of charges. Despite sotto voce—perhaps not so sotto—remarks from the Minister, it is important that charges and fees should be carefully examined. I served during almost all the previous Parliament on the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. All too often, once charges have been imposed, Departments try to put them up, sometimes exponentially, and the Committee raised that matter over and over again with at least some Departments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) was right to raise that issue, and to point out that the Bill contains sweeping powers, sometimes called Henry VIII powers. The House need not take my word alone on that; the Bill has incurred the wrath of the Select Committee on Delegated Powers and Deregulation in the other place. Lord Annaly told the other place that the Committee recommended that "the fees charged for granting a licence to both training providers and those wishing to attend training courses should either be approved by the Secretary of State or be subject to a limit specified in regulations. These amendments fulfil that requirement".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 5 June 1998; Vol. 590, c. 665-6.]

I hope that the Minister will listen to another important point that affects him directly and that relates both to the amendments and to later Bills. It was suggested to the Select Committee that a ministerial assurance would, in certain circumstances, do the trick. The Committee robustly made it clear that it would not be satisfied by that. Ministers of all Governments, but particularly of the current one, should take note.

Our view is that the amendments, which were debated at some length in the other place, are sensible. To some extent, they fulfil requirements set out by the Select Committee in trying to water down the sweeping powers that the Bill gives to Ministers. We support calls in both Houses for safeguards. We are not against the Bill in principle and we do not intend to divide the House on the amendments. After proper scrutiny—I emphasise those words—we shall wish the Bill and the amendments a fair wind.

Mr. Collins: I want to comment on the relationship between the amendments and the other provisions of the Bill. The Bill's explanatory and financial memorandum states:

"The financial effects of the Bill will depend on the content of . . . regulations and cannot at this stage be predicted. In particular, the regulations may confer power on the Secretary of State to provide training courses. The Secretary of State will have a duty to consult before regulations are made".

The amendments, which will broaden the powers of the Secretary of State to allow him to provide for the charging of fees, will, even more than before, mean that the House is being asked to pass a Bill without any real understanding of its financial effects. That is not a good basis on which to legislate. The financial effects of legislation should be set out in some detail in advance, and it is a matter of concern that the amendments will introduce even more uncertainty about the Bill's financial implications. That is a bad precedent. The Minister is waving something at me; would he care to intervene?

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: I know that the hon. Gentleman is a new Member of Parliament, so let me draw his attention to the regulatory appraisal. I should have thought that he would have read it if he wanted to make an informed contribution to debate.

Mr. Collins: I am grateful to the Minister. He and I sat together in the Standing Committee on the Competition Bill. He will recall that the standard regulatory appraisals brought before Committees by the Government are seriously slipshod and have been greatly condemned by industrial bodies. They are deeply misleading and, frankly, they offer no basis for serious consideration.

The amendments broaden uncertainty about the financial implications of the Bill, even though, as my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) has said, the implications for the economy as a whole are likely to be relatively small.

Mr Rowe: One of the dangers of Bills such as this is the precedent created for others. If the Government wake up to the fact that 141 people die on average every year in swimming accidents, they may wish to bring in exactly the same kind of regulation for swimming.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should know better. I have already said that it is out of order to talk about other matters.

Mr. Collins: My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) is right to say that the issues raised by the amendments range more widely. We must be conscious that the House is an administrative and deliberative body, and we must be aware of the potential implications of any precedents that we may set, even on a Friday morning.

Mr. Colvin: When the Minister gives the Government's view on the Bill, he will be able to tell us which measures they are likely to introduce. The Bill is essentially an enabling measure, and we should have some idea of the financial implications of fees, training costs and other matters. I hope that the Minister will be prepared to give the House some idea of how he will use the Bill's enabling powers.

Mr. Collins: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. We look forward with great anticipation to a detailed speech from the Minister. We hope that he will set out the principles on which the Government propose to implement the Bill, and give some detail of the precise levels of charges to be implemented for training courses, if the amendments are agreed to. We would like some indication of how the charges will be reviewed because, given that the Government have lost control of inflation, the chances are that the fees may need to increase rapidly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When the Minister replies, he will reply to the amendments.

Mr. Forth: I doubt it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I will make sure that the Minister replies to the amendments, just as I am making sure that everyone speaks to the amendments.

Mr. Collins: You are quite right, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I am sure that the Minister will bear that injunction in mind, as will I.

My second point is that the amendments would, like all other regulation-making powers in the Bill, be subject to clause 2(1), which states:

> "The Secretary of State may by regulations ... make any provision which he considers appropriate for the purpose of securing that fireworks are used safely."

In other words, the power to charge fees for the grant or variation of licences relating to training would be subject to the overriding provision that it should be subject to his or her judgment about how fireworks can be used safely.

The fees may not be decided by financial considerations, such as their affordability or being charged at a rate that provides good value for money, but will be subject to the Secretary of State's interpretation of what is necessary to provide safety. If the Secretary of State can charge fees for such a wide range of training services, he could use the power to drive certain businesses out of the sector if he believed that it was an important means of achieving greater safety for the public, animals or others set out in clause 2. He could use the fee structure as a weapon against a company that Department of Trade and Industry officials thought was acting unsafely, but were unable to get under any other provision. It could be used against a company that had, in some way, offended officials. It is a dangerous power to be in the hands of Government officials or the Secretary of State.

Mr. Burden: As the hon. Gentleman has linked the amendment to the general issue of safety, will he clarify whether he wants the Bill to pass?

10.30 am

Mr. Collins: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that question. The Bill is flawed, but it seeks to achieve important objectives. I heard my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) give the position of the official Opposition. I regard my Front-Bench colleagues as a source of great wisdom on all matters and, in due course, I shall no doubt be influenced by what he said. While Labour Members are at liberty to try to stretch out the debate if they so wish, I want to return narrowly to the amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker, you explained earlier how you would try to ensure that the Minister replied in some detail. He must give an assurance in the Official Report, which can be studied in detail by the industry, that there is no question of the Government using the powers that they would be granted if the amendments were passed, or any of the Bill's provisions, to drive companies out of the firework sector for any reason other than that they are breaching clear, safety-based regulations. Will the Minister assure us that there is no question of the Government, or any arm thereof, using the powers to impose licences and charges for training purposes in order to drive companies out of the sector? It is important to get that assurance; I hope that we can look to the Minister for it.

In debating these amendments, we have been able to start—only start—to examine some of the implications of a complicated Bill which is likely to have implications across a wide range of sectors. It is important to consider them properly and thoroughly. When the Minister replies, it is important that he establishes in detail the Government's position across the range of issues raised by the Bill. A skimpy 30-second reply would not be adequate. I hope that we have started a proper examination of legislation that is likely to affect people for many years to come, and I hope that that will be reflected in the debate in coming months.

Mr. Forth: We are considering amendments to clause 10. In judging them, it is important to place them in the context of the opening words of clause 10, which set the tone for our judgment about their value or otherwise. The key words are at the beginning of the clause, which states:

"If fireworks regulations specify conditions relating to the satisfactory completion of a course, or courses, of training in the use of fireworks, they may make provision for courses".

Straight away we have a suggestion of the problems that are likely to arise from the provisions not only of clause 10, but of the amendments.

The introduction of the words "satisfactory completion" immediately poses the questions of who judges whether the training courses are satisfactory and who judges whether the people giving the training courses, and those receiving them, are operating satisfactorily. I shall return to that later, but I wanted to show the difficulty when we get involved in elaborate regimes of licensing and prohibition of the sort set out in the Bill. We shall have to turn our minds, in judging fees, to the context of "satisfactory completion of a course, or courses".

That will provide a useful benchmark against which to judge the later provisions of clause 10.

Several hon. Members asked whether, as the clause suggests, courses should be provided directly by the Secretary of State. That implies that they would be run by the DTI, and the clause admits that as a possibility. In that case, the fees would apply only to those receiving the training courses. We are immediately confronted by the possibility of an additional bureaucracy run directly by the Department to provide the training required under clause 10, should the Secretary of State wish to invoke it. The clause starts, "If fireworks regulations specify"; it does not require such regulations.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) said, the Minister should say up front whether the Secretary of State has it in mind to invoke the provisions of clause 10. If she does not, we have spent much time rather needlessly. It would be valuable—indeed, it is essential—if the Minister told us the Secretary of State's intentions. That point also applies to the provisions of clause 10(1)(a), (b) and (c), because it would make a difference to the debate on Lords amendments on fee levels if we had some idea of what the Minister had in mind. This would apply either to the direct provision of courses by the DTI or to courses provided by "a body or bodies established or recognised by the Secretary of State".

As was noted earlier, other bodies could be involved, in which case the later provisions of clause 10 and the amendments would come into effect.

Then we come to "licensed persons", which is where the concerns expressed earlier are most clear. As I interpret the clause—I am open to correction—there are two distinct levels of licensing and operation and, therefore, of fees. The first level would be the provisions in the amendment and clause 10 on the regime for the licensing by the Secretary of State of the providers of training. That immediately opens all the normal questions that arise in such a process. It must be determined whether the fees are at a level sufficient to attract people to provide the training on a business basis. We are, presumably, talking about private providers who would not only have to provide satisfactory training—we will return to how that will be judged—but provide it profitably, because they would be private sector businesses, unless local authorities were used. That opens a different possibility. We have to bear in mind always the fees that providers would pass on to those whom they trained.

We are into a morass of bureaucracy; we have no guidance about the number of bodies. I am not aware that it has ever been mentioned. The Minister will want to spend some time giving us an idea of the number of bodies or licensed persons that he thinks will be necessary to obtain the quality of training needed to deliver the level of safety that he has in mind, in the bureaucratic mess that would be created.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in the structure of what is proposed—he is setting out the questions clearly—there is a potential interplay between fees for the granting of a licence and fees that are determined by the Secretary of State for the charging for attendance at courses? If that interaction works in the wrong way, the Secretary of State may deter able people from applying to become licensed persons, and hence restrict the supply of trade.

Mr. Forth: That is a crucial point, on which I may wish to elaborate in a moment. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising it at this stage.

The relationships at every level of the provision in clause 10 will, I suspect, provide enormous challenges to the Department and the Secretary of State, and create an enormous number of problems. We are necessarily talking about a complex set of interrelationships between the judgment of the Secretary of State, the number of people whom she would wish to license to carry out the important task provided for in clause 10, and the number of people she would expect to apply for and to need the training required to provide the level of safety assurance that the Bill is presumably all about in the first place.

Mr. Rowe: Does my right hon. Friend think that only one level of fee will be declared by the Secretary of State, or more than one? Some people who have spent their life in the pyrotechnics industry are probably fully qualified in any case, but if they have not been through a course, they may not be allowed to operate. Will they be charged a fee? Will they be charged a different fee from that charged to a parent or schoolteacher who wants to qualify to run a fireworks party? These are complex issues.

Mr. Forth: Indeed they are. My hon. Friend's question raises another interesting point that I had not thought of, on which my hon. Friend may wish to elaborate if I do not. The point is whether there will have to be exemptions from the regime for exactly the sort of people whom my hon. Friend describes. There must be—must there not?—people with relevant qualifications, training and experience who could be exempted from being trainers or being trained before they could carry out the activities covered by the Bill. That in turn raises some important considerations about whether these are blanket provisions with no exemptions or whether there will be reasonable provision for exemptions.

I want to return to the theme that I was touching on, because it is important. Unless we have some idea of numbers, we are all debating the matter rather in a fog. Do the Minister and the Secretary of State envisage many providers coming forward to do the training? If so, that assumes that many people will apply to receive the training in order to operate fireworks for the delight and pleasure of many people. Unless we know about the numbers, we cannot make a proper judgment about the effectiveness of the clause or about the competitive or non-competitive regime that my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) mentioned earlier.

If we are to judge how we shall vote on the amendments and our view of the Bill, it is incumbent on the Minister—he bears a heavy responsibility in the House this morning—to give adequate and full answers to the questions that have been raised in the debate.

Mr. Burden: It is important that we get on the record the right hon. Gentleman's position. He referred to his views on the amendments and the Bill. Is he saying that, if the amendments were accepted, he would or would not vote for the Bill? Is he saying that, if the amendments were not accepted, he would or would not vote for the Bill?

Mr. Forth: Fortunately, at this stage, procedurally that question does not arise—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is right. The question does not arise. We are considering the amendments, not whether the right hon. Gentleman supports the Bill. We are discussing the amendments.

10.45 am

Mr. Forth: The amendments from the other place relate to clause 10, which deals with some key elements of the elaborate regime that the Bill seeks to erect in order to deliver a level of comfort, safety and assurance.

Mr. Lansley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is something of a misapprehension that the amendments are all of a piece? It may be perfectly possible to agree that the Secretary of State should make provision for the setting of a fee for the grant of a licence, but to disagree with the idea that the Secretary of State should set a fee for attendance at a course.

Mr. Forth: That is an important point. My hon. Friend may wish to receive the guidance of the Chair on whether we can seek separate Divisions on the different elements for precisely the reason that he suggests. It is perfectly possible that the Secretary of State may wish to be involved in the first level of fees—those involved in the granting or variation of licences—but may not judge that it is necessary to be involved in setting a level of fees for the delivery of training by licensed persons or bodies. That is a matter on which we might require clarification from the Chair at some stage.

Mr. Lansley: My right hon. Friend is courteous in giving away again. There is a certain amount of Treasury guidance on the setting of a fee for the grant of a licence. Unless otherwise provided for, the fee should be that required to compensate for the costs involved. In a sense, one can see the limited effect of that. That brings me back to my earlier point. If there are also fees relating to the charge for attendance, one finds a complication between two amendments in the group which could be deleterious to the provision of training.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend is right. He gives me an opportunity to raise another point that is important in any regime such as this. All along, some of my hon. Friends have referred to a fee. I am not sure that we necessarily are looking at a standard, uniform fee. It always worries me when we talk about any regime of this kind to be considered and then imposed by a Secretary of State. Should there be a uniform regime for the entire country? As my hon. Friends will appreciate and some Labour Members may appreciate on a good day, the costs incurred in delivering the regime envisaged in clause 10 are likely to vary enormously in different parts of the country.

Looking around the Chamber at my hon. Friends who are here for the debate this morning, I can well imagine that the costs of putting together and delivering a training course would vary between, for example, Penrith and the Border and Westmorland, where they might be relatively low, and my constituency or Mid-Kent, where the inherent costs of delivery are likely to be higher.
